Paragraph 212 of the proposed tariff law provides for chinaware (tableware) at a rate of 60 per cent ad valorem on undecorated and 70 per cent ad valorem on decorated. This paragraph includes two classes of ware, viz, ordinary china and "bone" china.

The ordinary china is made of earthy substances, such as clay, feldspar, etc., while the "bone" china contains 25 per cent or more of "calcined bone."

The former is the class of ware used in the homes of people of average or limited means, while the latter is the most expensive china manufactured either in the United States or imported from abroad. A fair idea of the value may be had from the fact that plates made of this "bone" china sell at wholesale in the domestic market at prices ranging from $30 to $500 per dozen plates. These plates are known in the trade as "place plates" and are used at fashionable dinners as table decorations. They are of a rich cream-colored appearance, highly decorated in gold or bright colors, and their character may be identified by such names as "Royal Doulton," etc.

On August 18, 1922, Senator JONES of New Mexico offered an amendment on the floor of the Senate to reduce the rates of 60 and 70 per cent on chinaware, the bulk of which is used in ordinary homes, to 50 and 60 per cent, respectively. This amendment was strenuously opposed by Senator FRELINGHUYSEN, of New Jersey. The Senator from New Jersey in his debate against the proposed reduction sought by Senator JONES of New Mexico stated that there was a difference of 238 per cent between the German export price of chinaware and the German home value and that 70 per cent duty, which is 15 per cent more than the existing rate and 10 per cent higher than the Payne-Aldrich rate, was necessary to partly protect the American manufacturer, on the theory that Germany could lower her existing export prices and undersell the domestic manufacturer. The absurdity of this argument is evident on the face of it.

However, here is the joker in the paragraph in the shape of an amendment offered by Senator FRELINGHUYSEN on August 19, the day the bill was passed by the Senate, at the eleventh hour and fifty-ninth minute—and adopted by the Senate. Note how the rates of duty on the rich man's "Royal Doulton" ware were fixed below those of the ware used in every poor man's home.

Says the millionaire Senator from New Jersey:

"I offer the following amendment: Any of the foregoing articles containing 25 per cent or more of calcined bone, not painted, decorated, etc., 50 per cent ad valorem; painted, decorated, etc., 55 per cent ad valorem."

In explanation of this amendment the Senator from New Jersey stated:

"Mr. President, this amendment can not be objected to. It takes the bone china out of the paragraph and reduces the rate from 60 to 50 per cent on the undecorated and from 70 to 55 per cent on the decorated. It has been agreed to under a resurvey by the Tariff Commission and is a reduction in the present paragraph."

No atttempt was made by the Senator from New Jersey to produce the alleged "resurvey of the Tariff Commission" and no effort was made to explain to the Senate just what "bone china" really was. It is safe to say that not a single person in the Senate Chamber, excepting possibly the Senator from New Jersey, on the floor, and Tariff Commissioner Burgess, who sat in the gallery, knew the portent of this amendment. Consequently on the bald statement of the Senator from New Jersey that the amendment reduced the rates in the paragraph it was adopted by the Senate and the poor man was delivered another tariff "solar plexus" to the tune of an additional $12,000,000 to his annual dinner-ware bill.

The rate of 55 per cent on "bone china" is perfectly fair and justifiable, but the absurd rate of 70 per cent on ordinary china can not be justified by any stretch of the imagination or by any distortion of the facts. The discrimination in the rate of duty between "bone china" and ordinary china is a distinct sop to the English manufacturers and a deliberate and premeditated blow to France.

Thus the question arises as to whether or not the Senator from New Jersey was really sincere in his contention that 70 per cent was necessary to protect against an imaginary reduction in German prices of a possible 238 per cent or was he attempting to pull the Domestic Pottery Association's chestnuts out of the fire to satisfy a long-standing animosity toward the Limoges china manufacturers of France against whom the above-mentioned association carried on a 20-year campaign of active antagonism through their former lobbyist, William Burgess, now a member of the United States Tariff Commission.

The statement which I have just inserted calls attention to the fact that by a provision put on in the Senate the rate on this high-class bone china was reduced to 50 and 55 per cent, while the rates on the common people's china remained at 60 per cent. This was accomplished by the Senate provision putting a proviso in the bill. Turn to your bill if you want to and see just exactly what those jokers are. I can not understand why any fair-minded man would permit them to be put in there. I want somebody to explain it if he can.

Mr. GARNER. Paragraph 212.

Mr. SNYDER. It is on page 38 of the bill.

Mr. GARNER. All right; look at the bottom of page 38 and see what the original House bill was, china, porcelain, and so forth. The rates were 60 and 70 per cent, the cheaper china 60 per cent ad valorem. God knows that was high enough. Here is the Senate provision that was put in lowering the rate on this high price china. It reads:

Any of the foregoing articles containing 25 per cent or more of calcined bone, not painted, colored, tinted, stained, enameled, gilded, printed, or ornamented or decorated in any manner, 50 per cent ad valorem; painted, colored, tinted, stained, enameled, gilded, printed, or ornamented or decorated in any manner, 55 per cent ad valorem.

Now, gentlemen, I say that if the statement I have referred to is correct, and that, as stated on the floor of the Senate, this Senate proviso was put in the bill after a survey by the Tariff Commission, then the man who made that survey is not a proper man to tell the President of the United States whether he ought to lower or raise tariff duties. This Senate proviso lowers the duty on the very highest price china, which only the rich can buy, and leaves the high rates on the chinaware which the man of moderate means must buy. That is what I want to draw to your attention, the danger of placing this extraordinary power in the hands of the President to be exercised, of course, upon the recommendation of the Tariff Commission.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As I expect to answer the gentleman when it comes to my turn, I should like to have him state what he means by a "survey." No member of the Tariff Commission ever gave any advice as far as I know.

Mr. GARNER. I am simply referring to the statement made in the Senate by the Senator who offered this amendment to which I am referring. He said he offered it after a survey had been made by the Tariff Commission. I do not know whether the Senator was correct in his statement or not. I am merely quoting what the Senator said. I am going to give you Republican Members a chance to correct some of the wrongs and inequalities of this bill. I am going to move to recommit the bill with some instructions on certain items. Gentlemen, I was surprised when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] held up this bill and said, "Here is the last word." I knew he did not mean it.

This bill does not suit Mr. FORDNEY. This bill is the result of trading. The gentleman from Michigan is a high protectionist all the way down the line. He may do a little trading on his own hook, but as a consistent high protectionist he stands out above everybody else. I was surprised to-day when I heard how few of you Republicans from New York are going to vote for this bill? How many Republicans from the Empire State, the State with the largest population, a great manufacturing State, a great trading State, how many of you are going to vote for this bill?

Mr. HUSTED. I am going to vote for it.

Mr. GARNER. Yes. But is there any other Member from New York? I see one over there, Mr. CROWTHER. You can not make protection too high for him. There are 30 Members from New York here on the Republican side. I am going to give you gentlemen an opportunity when I offer my motion to recommit the bill to see how you will line up. I am going to give the Republican Members from Missouri a chance to say whether or not they want to put a duty of $30 a ton on potash. I am going to give some New Jersey Members who have truck farms in their districts a chance to say whether or not they want their farmers to pay an increased price for their fertilizers merely to build up a few special interests. That is a thing that should arouse every thinking man who is really a friend to agriculture.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. In a moment I will be glad to yield to the gentleman. Perhaps I may answer his question as I go along.

I say that this potash provision is inexcusable, and the reason it was put on for a period of three years was not that there was really any hope that a potash industry of any considerable proportions can be built up in this country. It was not put on for that reason. It was put in the bill for the benefit of one certain interest in the West, in the State of Utah. They are to have an opportunity to gouge the farmers to the extent of $30 a ton for potash which has already been produced. This is legislation under the name of protection for interests that already have the stuff in their hands at the present time. It is not intended to develop any industry. No potash industry could be built up in this country for $30 a ton. It costs more to bring it from these western States where the alkali lakes are found to the Atlantic seaboard to New York and Norfolk, twice as much in freight rates, as it costs to bring it from Germany and France by water. Then, in addition to that heavy handicap, the producers of potash in these western States have to get it from a brine which is found in these alkali lakes, and the brine has to be evaporated and the potash extracted in that manner. It is much more expensive to produce than from the mines in Germany and France, where they have natural deposits. I have seen no one who claims that potash can be produced in this country from the brine found in these western lakes for a cost within 50 cents per unit of what it can be produced abroad. It is manifest that any duty high enough to enable the producers of potash in the United States to compete with these great natural deposits in Germany and France would impose upon the American farmer a burden which would be inexcusable and outrageous. I am going to give you a chance to correct some of these injustices by a motion to recommit. Now, no gentleman on the Republican side can say, if he does vote against it, that we will not have a tariff bill, because it can go back and in 10 minutes they can carry out the instructions and agree to the Senate amendment if instructed so to do.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The gentleman has not yet yielded to me to say whether or not he is going to put anything else in the motion to recommit.

Mr. GARNER. I am not going to put many items in my motion to recommit, because I know some of you would like to get from under the handicap of voting for this bill. I want you Republican gentlemen to go home and tell your people, meet your Democratic opponents between now and November and tell them that you had an opportunity to get a protective tariff bill with potash on the free list and the dye embargo knocked out of it, and you refused to do it. There is not a farmer organization in this country, not a single one, that has not indorsed free potash, urged it on the committee, urged it on the conferees, and yet the Republican conferees have ignored the request.

Now, some of you gentlemen voted this morning to sustain the ruling of the Speaker and follow your leader, Mr. MONDELL. You will say that you were standing by the Republican organization, that you could not vote against the Speaker, that such a thing was never done, that they must remember the Cannon episode, and that such occurrences destroy the party. When I offer the motion to recommit, you are not going to have that excuse. The record is going to be clear. You have got to answer to your constituents when you vote on that proposition whether you are in favor of a duty on potash and an embargo on dyes. When I witnessed the parliamentary controversy this morning I thought about Attorney General Daugherty and the talk of his bringing a suit in the courts of the country to prosecute this awful dye industry and the Chemical Foundation, and yet these conferees come together and say, "Yes; let us continue this dye embargo at least 12 months and even longer, if the President says so by proclamation." Ah, gentlemen, you can not fool the people. In 30 days they are going to have this bill analyzed. They will know more about it then than they do now.

Mr. McARTHUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I will yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. McARTHUR. Then the gentleman approves of something that the Attorney General has done, does he?

Mr. GARNER. I hope Mr. Daugherty will place every one of those who are guilty of violating our antitrust laws in the penitentiary. I guess we had better wait, however, until we see what results he gets before going into an anticipatory eulogy of what he is going to do.

This conference report is a fair illustration of what will always happen when the House turns over its rights to the Rules Committee or the steering committee rather than to exercise them in its own proper way. The Republican Party, now in full control of both branches of the Government, is forgetting the interests of the country by placing a tariff law upon the statute books like this one which will remain for four years under the best condition possible. It looks to me like you are making a greater effort to keep alive your old shibboleth of high protection than you are to face world conditions as they actually exist.

UNDERWOOD TARIFF LAW VERSUS FORDNEY BILL.

When the Democrats came into power in 1912 they were under definite promise of the Baltimore platform to revise the tariff downward. The Republicans in 1908, at their convention in Chicago, declared for a revision of the tariff, which of course the country interpreted to mean a downward revision, but when a Republican Congress did actually meet after the campaign they framed and passed the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, which was higher than its predecessor, the Dingley bill, and which was so plainly drawn to protect the special interests that the country repudiated the party which had thus broken faith with the people, and in 1910 a Democratic House was elected and so well did it conduct itself under the able leadership of Mr. Clark of Missouri that this victory was followed up in 1912 by a complete triumph all along the line, the Republican Party carrying only two States in the Union—Utah and Vermont.

Soon after President Wilson was inaugurated, March 4, 1913, he called a special session of Congress, and the Democrats immediately set to work to redeem their campaign pledges, and after careful and painstaking effort the Underwood-Simmons tariff law was passed. Every man who has studied this measure and wants to be fair and impartial is bound to admit that it is a faithful and honest fulfillment of a party pledge, and the fact that it was so vehemently assailed at the time of its enactment by the special interests is proof conclusive that it is a bill for the people and not for the tariff barons. The measure was in harmony with our traditional policy of tariff for revenue only and not to build up a prohibitive tariff wall to protect the swollen fortunes of the rich.

If this same policy had been pursued by the Republican Party during its almost 50 years of power we would not now have so many swollen fortunes in this country, and the wealth of the Nation would be more equitably distributed. It is this concentration of wealth which has brought about so many serious and perplexing social and economic problems and which the present administration is doing so little to solve along sane and constructive lines. What we need is more capitalists and not less of them, and by that I mean not men of swollen fortunes but more of those of moderate means who by industry and thrift accumulate a part of their earnings and invest them in homes, farms, factories, railroad stocks, and other industrial enterprises. To my mind one of the most serious problems of the present day is to so arrange our industrial system that the average man will have his full chance to share in the fruits of production, and to do this we must see that the business opportunities of the country are not monopolized by a comparative few corporations and individuals. Nothing has been more productive of monopoly than the Republican policy of a high protective tariff, and there is no better way to check this tendency to monopoly than for the channels of trade to be kept open and free so that a healthy competition will be encouraged and promoted, both in foreign and domestic commerce. And now you Republicans are going to deal a blow to the good work which our Democratic tariff policy has done by passing this Fordney bill.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert a letter which I received from Mr. William Burgess, member of the Tariff Commission. This letter is in explanation and reply to a statement which I placed in the RECORD in connection with my speech on the conference report on the tariff bill and which statement dealt with the lowering of the rate on "bone china." I feel that I should put this letter in the RECORD in justice to Mr. Burgess. It reads as follows:

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION,
Washington, September 13, 1922.

MY DEAR MR. GARNER: I was extremely surprised while sitting in the gallery to hear your remarks regarding the anonymous communication relative to "bone china" and a member of the Tariff Commission.

I fully sympathize with you in all you said regarding the unfitness of a person sitting on the Tariff Commission who would be guilty of such practices as you based your remarks upon, but I very greatly regret that you had not seen wise to have communicated with me before using the anonymous communication upon the floor of the House.

I, like many others, received a copy of this communication and I feel very satisfied in my own mind as to the author of the same.

There have been a number of similar attacks made on me through the newspapers and by personal converse on the part of this man with members of the House and Senate committees. He represents the Japanese importing interests and because I have in the past been able to assist the Government in checking irregularities on the part of these and other importing houses I have very naturally aroused their antagonism.

Since assuming my duties on the Tariff Commission I have cut off all official connections with my former associations and have simply answered questions when requested so to do by Senators or Representatives on matters about which I was acquainted.

So far as the particular subject of "bone china" is concerned the facts are simply these: Judge Martin, of New Jersey, a personal and very warm friend of Senator FRELINGHUYSEN, was also a friend of two English importers, namely, Mr. John Miller and W. S. Pitcairne. Judge Martin, at their request, suggested to Senator FRELINGHUYSEN the possibility of reducing the china rates upon "bone china" made almost exclusively in England and being practically noncompetitive with goods produced in this country with the exception of one concern, namely, the Lenox (Inc.), of Trenton, N. J.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN called me on the phone and asked if I thought that the change proposed would injure any American concern. In reply I told him that there was but one concern making such goods in this country, to my knowledge, but did not know how they would feel about it. I told him who they were, and he in return asked if I could find out from them by phone how they felt about it. This I did in purely a personal way, and then communicated to Senator FRELINGHUYSEN the fact that they had no objections to his offering the amendment which he did.

That is absolutely all I had to do with the matter.

The quotation from Senator FRELINGHUYSEN'S statement on the floor of the Senate, namely, "It had been agreed to under a resurvey by the Tariff Commission and is a reduction in the present paragraph," is correct so far as the record goes, but the Senator made the statement evidently without consideration, as there was no resurvey made by the Tariff Commission nor was the question ever up before the Tariff Commission, and my part in the matter was not that of a commissioner but purely as a personal go-between.

I feel that I have done absolutely nothing worthy of criticism, and also knowing that you would not intentionally say or do anything injurious to anyone, I take pleasure in setting the whole matter before you.

The communication you received is a dirty, misleading, vicious document, and I feel that after reading it again in the light of this statement you will feel as I do about it.

Very sincerely yours,

WM. BURGESS, Commissioner.

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARNER. I am very much obliged to the House. I have taken much more time than I had anticipated, and I thank you for your kindness. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the Chair rule both on the question of the word "articles" and on the question of the period of time?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the Chair hear me a moment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. OLIVER. Some Member has just called the Speaker's attention to the fact that in the first part of section 315, now under discussion, the term "articles" is used, and the terms "product" and "merchandise" do not appear. Later, in the same section, the term "merchandise" is used, and in subdivision B of the same section the term "product" is used.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] correctly insists, I think, that the terms "merchandise" and "product" are more restrictive than the term "articles." He has correctly defined, from both the technical and common-use standpoint, the meaning of the terms "merchandise," "products," and "articles." Unquestionably, the term "articles" is broader than either "merchandise" or "products," and is sufficiently comprehensive to include anything that may be designated either as products or merchandise. The very fact that the bill, as originally written, after using the comprehensive term "articles," sought in the same section to limit its meaning and application by using first the restrictive word "merchandise" and in a subsequent paragraph the restricted word "products" clearly shows that the conferees have broadened and extended the meaning of this section by striking out both of the restrictive terms "merchandise" and "products" and inserting in lieu thereof the term "articles." The Speaker has called attention to the word "such," appearing before merchandise, as originally written, and which in itself clearly evidences the legislative intention of qualifying and restricting the meaning of the term "merchandise." In other words, section 315 in its original draft provided that only such articles as could be technically defined as merchandise were included in paragraph a of section 315, and only such articles as could be technically defined as products were included in paragraph b of section 315. The conferees, however, have extended the meaning of both paragraphs a and b of section 315 by striking out the restrictive terms or words "merchandise" and "products" and inserting in lieu thereof the broader and more inclusive term "articles."

Assuming that the fundamental premise on which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] bases his point of order is correct, then I submit that the conferees have in changing these words broadened and extended the meaning and application of section 315.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, there is no significance in the change from the word "products" to "articles" by the conferees. The word "articles" appears throughout the bill practically, and it was only at the suggestion of the Government expert in the Treasury Department, who thought it would be wise to use the same expression throughout the bill, that these amendments were inserted by the conferees.

Now, if the Chair cares to hear a word about the limitation of time, I shall be glad to address the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule, but the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the Chair is ready to rule, I will not take any further time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this whole matter resolves itself into a question whether the amendments are germane or not. The Senate has put in matter different from anything in the House bill. There is no difference between the House and Senate. There has been nothing to indicate what would be the position of the House on the subject, or between what limits the two Houses would differ. It seems to the Chair a pure question of germaneness, and that the conferees could put in any amendment that was germane. It seems to the Chair that you can easily see by reading the context that the word "articles" was probably put in, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], not to make a change of meaning but for the sake of conformity. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, at last, after more than 20 months since the Ways and Means Committee started hearings on the tariff bill, we again have the bill in the House. The House committee began hearings on the bill on January 6, 1921, and reported the bill later and passed it in July, 1921. The bill has been in the Senate ever since then until now.

If the gentlemen will examine the report they will find that the Senate made 2,428 amendments to the House bill, but that by changing the number of the first paragraph it necessitated changing practically every number in the bill. Consequently more than two-thirds of the amendments by the Senate are changes of numbers and clerical amendments—changing a comma to a semicolon, striking out a comma, changing "and" to "or," or "or" to "and," and so on.

Under the rules, in conference, when agreeing to such amendments it is customary for the House to yield with an amendment, whether yielding to the House or Senate views, if one is not identical with the other. So from the record it would appear that the Houses yielded in many more cases than did the Senate; which in reality was not the case.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen: The people of the United States have prospered as have no other people on this earth. Our Federal Government has now been in existence for more than one and a third centuries, and has stood the test. All good, law-abiding citizens will admit that we have the very best laws of any government in the world. We are, I believe, agriculturally and industrially the most productive nation on earth, and it is claimed, correctly, I believe, that our consumptive power is greater than that of all the rest of the world.

When comparing the wages earned with our living expenses we find that our people have a purchasing power equal to six times that of Great Britain, France, Germany, and Italy combined.

At the close of this present administration this Government will have endured for 136 years, 104 years of which period the party in power has been the high or protective tariff party; while for the remaining 32 years of the period mentioned the party in power has been the tariff-for-revenue, or low-tariff, or free-trade party.

Our periods of business depression have generally occurred during the times that the low-tariff party was in power.

In order for any people to be prosperous they must have a market for the sale or exchange of their surplus products. This market may exist at home or abroad, but it must exist somewhere—the home market is always the best and of the highest importance.

If we would prosper we must encourage our domestic industries, whether it be the farm or the factory. A nation without successful manufactures is a low-rate nation.

All of our great Presidents, from Washington down, have been protectionists. Washington and Adams were strong protectionists. Thomas Jefferson, the first Democratic President elected by that party, was a high protectionist, and while President he actually embargoed shipments of foreign articles.

The benefits of protection go first to labor; then to the people in general.

William McKinley said in 1897: "We lead all nations in agriculture; we lead all nations in mining; we lead all nations in manufacturing. These are the trophies which we bring after 29 years of protective tariff." What was true then is doubly so to-day.

All the Presidents from 1789 to 1832 were strong protectionists. Those of our many Presidents who favored a low tariff were Martin Van Buren, James K. Polk, Franklin Pierce, James Buchanan, Grover Cleveland, and Woodrow Wilson. All the others were protectionists.

Because of the great wealth, the developments and achievements of our people we are the envy of the world. Our people receive more in return for effort given than do the people of any other country on earth. The people of other countries now owe us more than $12,000,000,000. The annual interest on this sum at 5 per cent being $600,000,000, while but a century and a third ago we found much difficulty in borrowing from foreign countries the sum of $100,000,000. In that brief period of time we have become the richest nation in the world, largely because of our policy of carefully protecting our many industries against the importation of foreign products made by the cheap labor of other parts of the world.

Have our Democratic friends, through their free-trade or tariff-for-revenue-only policies, contributed their share to this wonderful success?

During the period of time that we existed as a union of colonies, after gaining independence by the war of 1776, free trade prevailed in all the Colonies. This policy proved to be most disastrous. Foreign countries, especially Great Britain, dumped their products upon our markets, and our money went out of this country until we had little or no gold or silver left. Our laborers found themselves out of employment with little or no purchasing power. Debt and ruin stared us in the face.

The first bill passed by Congress provided for the time and manner of administering certain oaths.

The second bill passed by Congress was a protective tariff measure, which was signed by President George Washington on July 4, 1789. The preamble to that measure reads as follows:

> Whereas it is necessary for the support of government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported, etc.

This bill was introduced by James Madison, a Democrat, a protectionist. In those days Democrats were protectionists, as many of that political faith are to-day. Is this not conclusive evidence that the founders of this Republic were protectionists?

The third measure passed by Congress was an act imposing a tonnage tax, signed by President Washington on July 20, 1789.

The fourth congressional measure established a State Department and was signed by George Washington July 27, 1789.

The fifth act of Congress provided for the collection of duties on merchandise and tonnage; signed July 31, 1789.

Please note that the paramount thought in the minds of President Washington and our Congress was protection to our industries while collecting revenue.

During these years of encouragement to capital and labor we have accumulated 28 per cent of the wealth of the world, and we have 36 per cent of the world's railroads, while at the same time we have but one-eighteenth of the world's population.

A protective tariff bill became a law on May 19, 1828, carrying specific and ad valorem duties ranging from 20 per cent to 50 per cent, and the free traders or low-tariff Democrats and foreigners called it "the abomination bill." Yet, under the protection given by that measure, capital was invested as never before in the building of factories, and, in the North particularly, our people prospered as never before in any previous period of our history during the life of that bill.

To-day the gold equivalent required to pay for an 8-hour day of labor in the United States will pay for 20¼ hours of labor in Great Britain, 150 hours in Japan, 33¼ hours in France, and 100 hours in Germany. Although knowing this to be true, there are gentlemen in this House, on the Democratic side, who would have free trade with this cheap labor. When the money paid out to employ 1 man for 8 hours in the United States will pay for 100 hours, or 10 men for 10 hours, among the greatest skilled labor in the world—Germany—can any man here say that we do not need protection to our labor and our capital? [Applause.]

Free trade here could have but one result, and that is that it would bring our laboring people to the low standard of life and living endured by the low-paid labor of foreign countries.

With foreign moneys depreciated from 50 per cent to 99 per cent below their normal values, and with the discovery of huge frauds upon the United States Treasury by undervaluation of imports, which prevents the Government from collecting the legal amount of customs dues, we find it necessary to change the basis for levying import duties from the foreign valuation to the American wholesale-selling price of the imported goods. In order to correctly apply this new method the bill directs the Tariff Commission to find the difference between the cost of production in the United States and the landed cost of the imported article and to report the same to the President of the United States. The bill further directs the President to issue a proclamation at once raising or lowering the duty named to meet such difference, and the same shall become effective within 15 days from the date of the proclamation.

The ad valorem rates in the Underwood tariff bill are the lowest average of any principal country in the world.

Most men are opposed to the immigration of the orientals, and our laborers do not want them to compete in our labor markets. That being true, how can such men consistently vote for free trade or a low tariff that will without question bring into our markets the competitive products of the orientals, which certainly will displace just so much American labor.

The Ways and Means Committee began hearings on this tariff bill on January 6, 1921, and reported the bill to the House the last week in June and passed it in the House July 21, 1921.

The Senate passed the bill some three weeks ago, and the conferees met on Thursday August 24, and finally agreed Saturday evening, September 9—15 days in conference. The total time consumed on this bill from the time our hearings began is one year eight months and seven days, more than twice the time ever taken by Congress in the passage of a tariff bill prior to this time. This is not the fault of the House, however, for it has lingered in the Senate thirteen and a half of the twenty months above mentioned.

No tariff bill heretofore passed by Congress has required the labor that has been employed in this bill. Many questions are involved in this measure never before considered in a tariff bill by the Congress of the United States.

Depreciated currency of foreign countries has occupied much time of the committee. It has developed that more fraudulent undervaluation is going on in our importations than ever before, dishonest importers are becoming more skilled in this line than in the past, thus depriving the United States Treasury of much revenue due on imports.

The passage of an antidumping bill and the adoption of the provisions of section 315 and other sections of this bill we believe will overcome much of this fraud, though fraud has always been and always will be practiced by many dishonest people in the world, no matter how strict the laws are, and how strictly enforced.

By this bill the administrative sections of the existing law have been codified. Many ancient and presently inoperative laws have been repealed or brought into harmony with later acts upon the same subject. The system presented, in form, is for that reason complete and up to date, affording enforcement officials and the interested public, in a single act, knowledge and access to those laws heretofore scattered through volumes of inaccessible statutes. Through cooperation with the Department of Commerce this work has kept the statutes affecting the operations of the Treasury and that department relating to the customs and shipping in harmony. This codification, made in the light of years of administration of these laws, has endeavored to relieve against all proven hardships, eliminate all shown abuses, and provide many meritorious changes.

All the weaknesses of the foreign valuation system of collecting revenues arising out of defects in the law itself have been cured. The system as here presented, profiting by the experience of years, is made so nearly perfect as any foreign valuation system can be made. Many, if not most, of the weaknesses of the existing system, so far as the code of laws was concerned, were greatly aggravated by the fact that importers alone were, to any practicable extent, permitted to contest rates or classifications of duty. Accordingly, after enactment, assault by thousands of protests were made by importers and the law weakened and broken down as far as possible. No privilege having been previously allowed manufacturers and producers to appear and defend in such cases, or to appear and support constructions and applications of the law favoring them, a gradual weakening of the system had been effected. The system also developed the unfair result that the Government, instead of occupying a neutral attitude save as its interests appeared, has been compelled, whenever done, to champion the cause of the manufacturers and producers.

There may be enumerated many very great and substantial improvements in the administrative features of this bill over the existing law.

Declarations upon invoices by foreign manufacturers as to sales prices, to whom the goods are sold, and all pertinent details of the importing transaction, must under this bill be sworn to, whereas now this is not required.

Declarations by the importer as to these facts and transactions are by this bill required to be sworn to, whereas at present that is not required. It is one of the chief weaknesses, and the one greatly complained of, that under the existing system goods could be imported without any effective oath being taken as to their sales price, their value, or as to any other important or particular fact of the transaction. By this bill such is required.

There is written in this bill also the requirement that the invoices must set out in detail whether or not the goods are at the time of importation sold or agreed to be sold in this country; and if so, to whom and where; and this, as stated, must be sworn to as true in the declaration accompanying the invoices, thereby requiring the importer to furnish under oath evidence of market values and a complete source of verified evidence to check up the correctness of all the stated facts of the transaction.

The bill introduced the conspicuous innovation of authorizing manufacturers to directly contest valuations and classifications with equal facility heretofore afforded importers only. The manifest fairness of this proposition seems self-evident. It is difficult to conceive how heretofore there has been practically denied one class, the producers, and not allowed another class of interested parties, the importers, to litigate a law affecting the interests of one as much as the other. Aside from upholding the manifest equity of this accorded right, it will make much for the better and fairer construction of the act by rightfully shifting that burden and privilege in many cases from the Government to the producers.

The administrative provisions, therefore, not only, so far as the system permits, provide against frauds but also provides an agency to maintain the bill in its integrity as by Congress intended.

The chief issue of difference between the two Houses of Congress was the different valuation systems. The House bill was predicated upon American valuation and the Senate bill upon foreign valuation. While as between the merits of the two systems the House conferees are unchangeably convinced that the American plan is incomparably the better, they concluded that existing conditions of the world's commerce warranted an agreement to proceed gradually with the substitution of the American for the existing foreign plan of valuation after due preparation by customs officials for its administration and after full and careful ascertainment of the proper duties affecting each class and kind of articles as changed. The substitution of the American for the foreign valuation plan for the levy of our ad valorem duties is an end so eminently desirable that its success should not be jeopardized by an incautious, ill-advised, or unduly hasty action in the accomplishment of that most desirable end.

While there was suggested and much discussed a compromise plan for the American valuation system provided in the House bill, to wit, that of assessing duties upon the American selling price of the imported article, it may well be doubted if that system would so well meet the requirements of protection to American manufacturers as the House plan.

That provided by the House is the pure American plan. If we are to gauge the measure of our duties in order to fully protect American products, no other standard for the valuation of such can possibly serve that purpose save the American selling price of the American product, and that is made the basis of the assessment of such duties under the House bill. The change from the foreign to that system, however, is one that will entail administrative and require observance of economic changes. All our administrative agencies are based upon the former plan and their adaptability to the latter by way of the necessary ascertainment and securing of due and fair samples and prices can best be done gradually after full investigation and preparation. Due regard for the ultimate success of the system so argues. The conference accordingly so provided.

These obvious facts, together with the existing conditions and of abnormally high American and swiftly changing world values generally, even to the extent of as much as 25 per cent in a single month, as has occurred in Germany, lead your conferees to agree to the compromise provisions of the conference report, to wit, the present adoption of rates based upon foreign valuation, with power vested in the President, as provided in section 315 (a) of the bill, to raise and lower the rates provided to meet swift and uncertain changes in foreign values, together with the adoption of the American valuation plan of the House, as provided in 315 (b), to be put into force and effect by the President gradually and advisedly, according as preparation for the administration thereof may be had and the trade conditions affecting the particular class or kind of articles warrant. Furthermore, your conferees are advised that as to many kinds and classes of imported goods importers and domestic producers can and likely will agree upon an American valuation basis and rates, whereupon this provision authorized its adoption as therein provided. Several of such agreements have already been had during the pendency of this bill. By this conference report the pure American valuation principle is recognized and adopted and provision made for its gradual adoption. By this provision American valuation becomes an approved and fixed principle and part of our customs system.

These provisions, together with the further powers vested by this bill of retaliation against discriminatory action upon part of foreign nations, are timely. In the readjustment of the world's trade on every hand is witnessed the investing of officials and tribunals with extraordinary powers calculated to compel trade equality and reciprocation. These are taking the form of preferential duties, limitations on imports, maximum and minimum provisions, antidumping laws, and various other kin forms. The Congress should feel itself derelict in duty if it concluded this legislation without arming our President in so far as possible with equal powers.

By the flexible and American valuation provisions of this bill for the first time in the history of this country has the President been granted a general and sufficient power to speedily meet discriminations against our commerce and swiftly changing trade conditions, natural or as produced by action of foreign nations.

No Congress has ever been called upon to enact a tariff in the presence of such uncertain, rapid, and extensive changes in our commerce. The conditions of to-day are not those of to-morrow. Our manufacturers and producers are on every hand being undersold and driven from our markets, and many of our laborers are walking the streets. Whatever action may be taken to-day may and probably will inevitably be excessive or inadequate to-morrow. It is preposterous to state nothing should be done in this emergency leaving our mills and workmen the victims of unprecedented foreign competition. The party in power has never proven incapable of meeting or shrunk from any national emergency. So that the duty of the hour is to make the best possible bill, one that will surely protect our own and which will authorize quick and effective changes to meet the swift and inevitable future changes of trade. By this bill these things are provided. The Congress has successfully met the most acute economic emergency of the country by protecting our industries and labor against the unprecedented low prices of foreign countries and at the same time provided adequate remedy for any and all the probable swift future changes in the conditions of the world's trade.

FREE PORTS.

The written instrument under which the United States operated from 1783 to 1789 is called the Articles of Confederation. The chief defect in this form of government was that the National Government had no authority to enforce its laws. Coupled with this was also the defect that each State was permitted to frame its own tariff laws, with the result that there were 13 such sets of laws in the United States, and that preference in them was given to the ports of one State over those of another State.

This period in history is designated by John Fiske, one of our greatest historians, as the "critical period of American history." The difficulties confronting the Government at that period are carefully set forth in a volume written by John Fiske entitled "The Critical Period of American History."

Chapter 4 of that volume is headed "Drifting toward anarchy," and in the course of that chapter, on pages 144 to 147, he discusses the evil results from a multiple system of tariff laws and the consequent preference extended to one port over another. We quote from him as follows:

"Meanwhile, the different States, with their different tariff and tonnage acts, began to make commercial war upon one another. No sooner had the other three New England States virtually closed their ports to British shipping than Connecticut threw hers wide open, an act which she followed up by laying duties upon imports from Massachusetts. Pennsylvania discriminated against Delaware, and New Jersey, pillaged at once by both her greater neighbors, was compared to a cask tapped at both ends. The conduct of New York became especially selfish and blameworthy. That rapid growth which was so soon to carry the city and the State to a position of primacy in the Union had already begun. After the departure of the British the revival of business went on with leaps and bounds. The feeling of local patriotism waxed strong, and in no one was it more completely manifested than in George Clinton, the Revolutionary general whom the people elected governor for nine successive terms. From humble origin, by dint or shrewdness and untiring push, Clinton had come to be for the moment the most powerful man in the State of New York. He had come to look upon the State almost as if it were his own private manor, and his life was devoted to furthering its interests as he understood them. It was his first article of faith that New York must be the greatest State in the Union. But his conceptions of statesmanship were extremely narrow. In his mind, the welfare of New York meant the pulling down and thrusting aside of all her neighbors and rivals. He was the vigorous and steadfast advocate of every illiberal and exclusive measure, and the most uncompromising enemy to a closer union of the States. His great popular strength and the commercial importance of the community in which he held sway made him at this time the most dangerous man in America. The political victories presently to be won by Hamilton, Schuyler, and Livingston, without which our grand and pacific Federal Union could not have been brought into being, were victories won by most desperate fighting against the dogged opposition of Clinton. Under his guidance, the history of New York, during the five years following the peace of 1783, was a shameful story of greedy monopoly and sectional hate. Of all the 13 States none behaved worse except Rhode Island.

"A single instance, which occurred early in 1787, may serve as an illustration. The city of New York with its population of 30,000 souls, had long been supplied with firewood from Connecticut, and with butter and cheese, chickens, and garden vegetables from the thrifty farms of New Jersey. This trade, it was observed, carried thousands of dollars out of the city and into the pockets of detested Yankees and despised Jerseymen. It was ruinous to domestic industry, said the men of New York. It must be stopped by those effective remedies of the Sangrado school of economic doctors, a navigation act and a protective tariff. Acts were accordingly passed, obliging every Yankee sloop which came down through Hell Gate, and every Jersey market boat which was rowed across from Paulus Hook to Cortlandt Street, to pay entrance fees and obtain clearances at the custom-house, just as was done by ships from London or Hamburg; and not a cartload of Connecticut firewood could be delivered at the back door of a country house in Beekman Street until it should have paid a heavy duty. Great and just was the wrath of the farmers and lumbermen. The New Jersey Legislature made up its mind to retaliate. The city of New York had lately bought a small patch of ground on Sandy Hook, and had built a lighthouse there. This lighthouse was the one weak spot in the heel of Achilles where a hostile arrow could strike, and New Jersey gave vent to her indignation by laying a tax of $1,800 a year on it. Connecticut was equally prompt. At a great meeting of business men, held at New London, it was unanimously agreed to suspend all commercial intercourse with New York. Every merchant signed an agreement, under penalty of $250 for the first offense, not to send any goods whatever into the hated State for a period of 12 months. By such retaliatory measures, it was hoped that New York might be compelled to rescind her odious enactment. But such meetings and such resolves bore an ominous likeness to the meetings and resolves which in the years before 1775 had heralded a state of war; and but for the good work done by the Federal convention another five years would scarcely have elapsed before shots would have been fired and seeds of perennial hatred sown on the shores that look toward Manhattan Island.

To overcome the difficulties of the Federal Government caused by the defects in the Articles of Confederation, a convention was called which met in Philadelphia in May, 1787. This convention is known in history as the Constitutional Convention. There had been previous conventions called for the purpose of patching up the Articles of Confederation, especially with reference to laws relating to commerce, but these had failed. In the call for the convention of 1787, the purpose was stated to be to revise the Articles of Confederation. When the delegates met they found that the Articles of Confederation were inherently wrong, and that it was necessary, if the evils were to be remedied, to cast aside the Articles of Confederation entirely and frame a new Constitution. This was so different from the purpose for which the convention was called that some of the delegates, notably, Messrs. Lansing and Yates, of New York, went home, leaving only Alexander Hamilton to represent that State.

It was early conceded in the convention that the National Government should have the power to enforce its own laws and to collect its own revenue. This last power was early agreed upon and set forth in Article I, section 8, of the Constitution, reading as follows:

The Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

The power thus conferred upon Congress to levy taxes would not, however, in itself correct the evil which resulted in commercial warfare under the Articles of Confederation.

The citations which are made herein to show how this evil was subsequently corrected are taken from the 1845 edition of Elliott's Debates on the Federal Constitution, volume 5, and are confirmed in all particulars by Madison's Journal, in which he records debates of the Constitutional Convention.

On August 25, 1787, Mr. Carroll and Mr. L. Martin, page 478, "expressed their apprehensions, and the probable apprenhensions of their constituents, that under the power of regulating trade, the general legislature might favor the ports of particular States by requiring vessels destined to or from other States to enter and clear thereat, as vessels belonging or bound to Baltimore, to enter and clear at Norfolk, and so forth. They moved the following proposition:

The Legislature of the United States shall not oblige vessels belonging to citizens thereof, or to foreigners, to enter or pay duties or imposts in any other State than in that to which they may be bound, or to clear out in any other than the State in which their cargoes may be laden on board; nor shall any privilege or immunity be granted to any vessel on entering or clearing out, or paying duties or imposts in one State in preference to another.

Mr. Gorham thought such a precaution unnecessary and that the revenue might be defeated if vessels could run up long rivers, through the jurisdiction of different States, without being required to enter, with the opportunity of landing and selling their cargoes by the way.

Mr. McHenry and General Pinckney made the following propositions: "Should it be judged expedient by the Legislature of the United States that one or more ports for collecting duties or imports, other than those ports of entrance and clearance already established by the respective States, should be established, the Legislature of the United States shall signify the same to the executives of the respective States, ascertaining the number of such ports judged necessary, to be laid by said executives before the legislatures of the States at their next session: and the Legislature of the United States shall not have the power of fixing or establishing the particular ports for collecting duties or imposts in any State except the legislature of such State shall neglect to fix and establish the same during their first session to be held after such notification by the Legislature of the United States to the executive of such State.

"All duties, imposts, and excises, prohibitions, or restraints laid or made by the Legislature of the United States shall be uniform and equal throughout the United States."

These several propositions were referred, nem. con., to a committee composed of a member from each State. The committee, appointed by ballot, were Mr. Langdon, Mr. Gorham, Mr. Sherman, Mr. Dayton, Mr. Fitzsimmons, Mr. Read, Mr. Carroll, Mr. Mason, Mr. Williamson, Mr. Butler, Mr. Few.

Mr. Sherman, as chairman of this committee, made the report of the committee, on August 28, and moved to lay the report on the table. The report is as follows:

That there be inserted after the 4th clause of the 7th section: "Nor shall any regulation of commerce or revenue give preference to the ports of one State over those of another, or oblige vessels bound to or from any State to enter, clear, or pay duties in another; and all tonnage, duties, imports, and excises laid by the legislature shall be uniform throughout the United States."

On August 31 the report of the above-mentioned committee was taken from the table (p. 502), and the question was divided, the convention first agreeing to the following, without opposition:

Nor shall any regulation of commerce or revenue give preference to the ports of one State over those of another.

On the clause "or oblige vessels bound to or from any State to enter, clear, or pay duties in another," there was some discussion, but this was finally agreed to by a vote of 8 to 2 (p. 503).

On September 14 (p. 543), while the convention was putting on the finishing touches and rearranging the final draft of the Constitution, these matters were again taken up and the words "but all such duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States," were unanimously annexed to the power of taxation, as provided for in Article I, section 8, of the Constitution, leaving that section in the form in which it now stands in that document.

Up to September 14, Article I, section 9, of the Constitution simply read, "No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State." On September 14 (p. 545) the convention voted to add to the above section 9 the words:

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another, nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

It will thus be seen that the Constitutional Convention, being thoroughly acquainted with the evils resulting from preference being given to certain ports of entry over other ports, took the necessary steps to guard against the recurrence of such evils under the Government established by the Constitution.

They provided in the first place, in Article I, section 8, that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States"; and they provided further, in Article I, section 9, that "No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another."

So much for the history of these two sections of the Constitution. The cases that have been decided under them are listed on pages 34 and 43 of the Constitution, Manual and Digest of the Sixty-sixth Congress, third session.

Gentlemen, I am frank to say to you that each and every member of the Ways and Means Committee from the time when we began on the bill more than 20 months ago has been most faithful indeed, and they have performed their duties as best they were able. Personally I do not believe that I have rendered greater service than other members of the committee. But I am completely worn out; I am so overdone with fatigue, with long hours of constant study and earnest effort to prepare and bring to you the best bill that could be prepared, so that in my humble way day after day and night after night I have prayed to God for greater wisdom that I might prepare a bill to serve the people better than any other bill of a like character that has ever been spread upon our statute books, and to that I have done my utmost as best I could. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. May I ask the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Ohio whether they expect to conclude this conference report to-night.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; we would like to, and take up the bonus bill to-morrow. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that; there are quite a number of gentlemen on this side who want to know whether we would finish the conference report to-night.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is the intention—to stay here until we finish it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to go into any detail in reference to the conference report, but only to refer to a few particular items. Before I do that I wish to corroborate with all the fervor that is within me what others have said relative to the sincerity and hard work that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means has given throughout these 14 months in bringing forth a tariff bill in the interests of the American people and in harmony with the Republican principles. We owe the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, whether we agree with him in detail or not, a very hearty vote of thanks for the efforts he has made through all these long and tedious months. No man could have worked harder. Now that he is about to lay down his work as chairman of that committee at the expiration of this Congress, I must say that any future chairman of that great committee has a very difficult task in following his footsteps. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I say this in reference to the remarks just made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]: He started to tell us this morning that he expected to bring in a motion to recommit only upon the item of potash, but when it developed that there was a difference of opinion among the Republicans he said he was going to bring in a double-barreled gun. I am sorry he is doing that. He advised the Republicans as to what they ought to do, and I desire to inform the gentleman that some Republicans did not follow the ruling of the Speaker this morning solely because he was right—I think he was, for I listened very attentively to the debate—and I honestly and conscientiously think the Speaker ruled right and in accordance with the rules of the House in his interpretation of the law.

But in addition to that we voted with him because the provision as originally put in the emergency tariff bill seemed to us right and proper in the dye situation. And so I say to the gentleman from Texas, if he wants a little advice from a Republican—inasmuch as he is so free always to give it to Republicans—let me advise him to make that a single-barrel gun instead of a double-barreled one, and then he will get more votes from the Republicans. I, for one, would vote for a motion to recommit this bill if confined to potash, but I can not vote with him if he makes it a double-barreled gun. He will get more votes with potash as one barrel than if he makes it a double-barreled gun and includes dyestuffs.

Now, there is another feature that I would like to refer to that has been mentioned by the gentleman from Texas. He has said a great deal about "special interests" and about sacrificing your own conscience, and all that sort of thing, and about party principles, and so on. I was first a Member of this House in the Sixty-third Congress, and I very well remember the able speech that the gentleman from Texas made urging the House to put a duty on Angora goat hides when his party was absolutely for free trade or for tariff for revenue only. It had nothing in the world to do with protection to Angora goats, but it happened that there was a flock of Angora goats down in Texas and he wanted that special industry protected. [Applause on the Republican side.] I think it does not behoove him to talk to us about protecting "special interests" when he has a "special interest" like that in a Republican bill. I congratulate that "special interest" in Texas.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. Is it not a fact that you insisted on free oil in Massachusetts, and Massachusetts does not produce it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, there are many other things we could discuss if we had the time.

Now I wish to make a few criticisms of the report of the conferees, and I do this with the utmost candor and freedom, at the same time realizing the difficulty that they have been in. In the first place, I became convinced that the American valuation method was the proper one to write into law, so far as a tariff bill is concerned, and I am very sorry that our conferees found it necessary to compromise on that detail. I wish that to-day we were voting to sustain the American valuation plan, but I think that the compromise which they are offering is a fair one, and in a sense a very proper one, namely, that a certain latitude and power should be given to the President within a range of 50 per cent to raise or lower the duties, and at the same time if he finds it necessary to use the American valuation to put that method into effect; so that in view of the attitude of the other branch I think the conferees have done as well as could be expected. But I do severely criticize them from the viewpoint of what appears to be a parliamentary development. When this bill was being prepared by the Committee on Ways and Means such rates as were written before the American valuation scheme was agreed upon were written at figures that were reduced about one-third when we afterwards agreed upon the so-called American valuation plan. It develops that wherever there are similar rates the same numerical figures used in the method of laying the duty, whether it was American or foreign valuation, the conferees have not felt that that subject is within the purview of the conference.

I certainly can not agree with that, because it is absolutely illogical. Probably on the parliamentary side that will be answered, but it is illogical. Let me use an illustration. There is a large manufactory of bicycles in my district. When the bill was written originally on the basis of the foreign valuation a rate was fixed, and then later on it was changed on the basis of the American valuation. The Senate in writing the foreign valuation rate fixed that item at 30 per cent foreign valuation. As a matter of fact a similar rate under American valuation is 45 per cent, and now the conferees say that that item is not in dispute. I can not for my part agree with that deduction.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not see how the conferees could possibly have done otherwise. If we concede that the difference between the figures was to be determined by market prices at home and abroad, the Speaker, in order to determine whether we had or had not exceeded our powers, or whether there was a change in the rate, would have to sit there with the foreign price list in one hand and the domestic price list in the other and compare them. Now, so far as I know, disputed questions of fact have never formed the basis for parliamentary ruling. These prices at home and prices abroad are more or less a subject of dispute. Sometimes the American price is absolutely less than the foreign. Of course, as a rule, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the American price is greater than the foreign price, but it can not be determined except as a question of fact, and I do not see how the Speaker could consider that.

Mr. TREADWAY. My colleague will not deny that the foreign valuation, as compared with the American valuation, was one-third less. We arbitrarily changed those figures, did we not, in committee sessions?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Technically, the gentleman is correct.

Mr. TREADWAY. So that from the viewpoint of the parliamentary situation the gentleman from Iowa is right, and from the standpoint of rates in the tariff bill I am right.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. We simply found our hands tied by the parliamentary situation.

Mr. TREADWAY. I appreciate that fact, and I have stated practically what the gentleman from Iowa has said. But it is extremely unfortunate for the rates in many instances where this identical figure appears.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HICKS). The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman from Iowa give me five minutes more?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Can the gentleman get along with three minutes?

Mr. TREADWAY. Make it five, and I will try to get along.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I make it five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. TREADWAY. There is one item in the paper schedule to which I wish to refer, a duty having been put on casein. Now, casein goes into the manufacture of coated paper, and it is very much against the interest of the paper manufacturer that a tariff should be placed on that article. Otherwise, I am glad to say that so far as I can learn the paper schedule is satisfactory to those interested in that large industry, of which so many mills are located in my district.

I want to devote the rest of my time to a reference to the wool schedule. I think there is the point where the greatest blunder has been made in the rewriting of this tariff bill. We put in the emergency tariff act rather high rates on wool, but as a matter of fact those rates have never been effective because the greater part of the wools imported since the emergency tariff went into effect are in bond. Now, what has been done has been to put an arbitrary price of 31 cents per pound on wool of all classes and prices. It does not make a particle of difference whether the wool originally cost 20 cents a pound or $1.50 a pound, the rate is 31 cents a pound just the same. So on cheap wool, which is known as carpet wool, and which is used for cheap clothing, wool which cost 20 cents a pound, you are allowing a rate of 150 per cent, whereas in the case of the higher grade wool, costing $1.25 per pound, you are also putting on 31 cents a pound, which is practically about a 20 per cent rate. In other words, the high-grade wool is coming in at the lower ad valorem rates.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman means carpet wool when used for clothing?

Mr. TREADWAY. I mean carpet wool used for the purpose of clothing, and great quantities of it are used for clothing purposes. I do not think that was well known at the time this provision was put in. It is well known now, and you are putting a very unfair duty on the lower grades of wool going to make cheap clothing. That, it seems to me, is where we will be very severely criticized.

The other item to which I wish to refer affects New England very materially, namely, the rates which in my view ought to have been placed as compensatory duties for the manufactures of our cotton mills. These rates are not adequate for the protection of the cotton industry of New England. Therefore it is with considerable effort that some of us are prepared to vote for this present bill. I wish it might have been different. At the same time the Republican Party is improving the present law very materially, and I for one am glad to overlook such objections as I have to it, and shall support the conference report. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair inform me how the time stands?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] has under his control 71 minutes and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has under his control 80 minutes remaining. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, there was published under date of July 31, 1922, for the use of the Committee on Finance, a document entitled "Imported merchandise, retail prices." That report contains a number of statements as to articles purchased in the city of New York, giving the retail prices of those articles and the purported or alleged landed cost. It gives the names of a number of stores in which these articles were purchased, many of them in my district. Their attention has been called to this pamphlet. A number of them have requested me to answer the charges made and to put the answer in the RECORD. I am doing so because I believe that when the names of stores and business houses are mentioned in a document of this character, in which it is made to appear that they are making exorbitant profits, it is but fairness to these men that their side of the question should be presented to the Congress and to the public. I therefore ask unanimous consent that these letters which I hand up be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that notwithstanding the general consent that was granted to extend remarks, this is probably a little outside of that request and therefore it ought to be put to the House. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing the letters which he has indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters referred to are as follows:

NEW YORK, September 6, 1922.

Hon. OGDEN L. MILLS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Colonel Friedsam has informed us of your letter of August 31 inclosing a copy of the document published by the Finance Committee of the Senate and giving certain information concerning imported merchandise. On page 56 of this document there is given in Exhibit 56 the alleged detail of a necklace purchased from B. Altman & Co. The statements made in this exhibit are with one exception, namely, the selling price, grossly incorrect. The necklace which is used for this exhibit—a photographic reproduction of the article and the sales check in the transaction is given on page 57—was manufactured by the firm of Joseph H. Meyer Bros., 170 Broadway, New York City. It is not an imported necklace but is American made completely. Its cost to B. Altman & Co. was $75. Its selling price was $150. We are preparing affidavits supporting these various facts, and if you wish to have them we shall be glad to send them to you. You will observe by comparing the facts given above with the allegations in the document sent us that in every respect except the selling price the details concerning this necklace have been absolutely misrepresented. May we add also that this same data which is now being supplied to you, as suggested in your letter, was given to an investigator who visited us stating that he represented the Government and that he sought information on this transaction.

We appreciate, indeed, the thoughtfulness and consideration of your letter, and are very glad that this has been called to our attention, for the statements presented in the report are very unjust and damaging, and their circulation should not be permitted.

Very truly yours,

B. ALTMAN & CO.

Hon. OGDEN L. MILLS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We beg to acknowledge the receipt of your esteemed letter dated August 31, with inclosure.

In response to this letter we wish to state that the matter you are referring to has been called also to our attention by the National Retail Dry Goods Association of New York.

We have looked most carefully over the instances that are cited against us and found that the transmissions of the appraiser's report to the chairman of the Committee on Finance were absolutely erroneous.

We are taking the liberty to inclose herewith the copy of our answer with the affidavit submitted to the managing director of the National Retail Dry Goods Association, Mr. Lew Hahn, which certainly will give sufficient explanation in this matter.

Thanking you for the courtesy extended to us we beg to remain,

Yours very truly,

STERN BROTHERS.

I, Julius Kugelman, do solemnly and truly swear that I am a vice president of the corporation, Stern Bros., 41 West Forty-second Street, New York.

I further swear that, after going over all our import records most carefully, I can truthfully state that we never imported from France valenciennes laces in cotton, as stated in the pamphlet entitled "Imported Merchandise and Retail Prices," page 26, Exhibit 25, and page 56, Exhibit 55, nor did we ever import from Germany buttons, vegetables, ivory (12-button cards), as stated on page 88, Exhibit 87.

Sworn to before me this — of ———, 1922.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1922.

Mr. LEW HAHN,
200 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

DEAR SIR: We beg to acknowledge the receipt of your esteemed letter of August 30, with a copy of a Government publication entitled "Imported Merchandise and Retail Prices."

Allow us to state that we looked most carefully over the instances that are cited against us, and found that a mistake must have occurred in the transmission of the appraiser's report, together with the exhibits to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, Hon. P. J. MCCUMBER.

We went over all our records most carefully for a number of years, and do not find that we ever have imported valenciennes laces in cotton from France, as mentioned in the pamphlet, on page 26, Exhibit 25, and on page 56, Exhibit 55, nor did we ever import from Germany buttons, vegetables, ivory (12-button card), as stated on page 88, Exhibit 87.

We are inclosing herewith affidavit properly signed by one officer of our corporation, as requested with your letter.

Yours very truly,

——— ———.

NEW YORK, September 6, 1922.

Hon. OGDEN L. MILLS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I received yesterday your favor of August 31 asking me whether the statements made as to R. H. Macy & Co. (Inc.), in the document recently published by the Finance Committee of the Senate entitled "Imported Merchandise and Retail Prices," are inaccurate.

I am glad to comply with your request for information that will enable you to controvert the evidence contained in the "document" for, in so far as our house is concerned, of the 12 items that were purchased of us, the information given is incorrect as to every one of the 12. Of the 12 only 3 were imported by us, and in no one instance is our cost correctly stated. In all 12 the cost was considerably higher than given in the document.

The three items that were imported by us are:

Exhibit 3, page 4, metal pie plate.
Exhibit 59, page 60, china dinner plate.

Exhibit 3, page 4, metal pie plate, cost landed $0.1889, without inclusion of any expense for landing charges, breakage in transit, or handling up to the time at which it is turned over to the retail selling department, which items might be likened to the expenses of an importing house. This item shows a mark on percentage of 53½ per cent instead of 181 per cent, as given in the "document."

Exhibit 41, page 42, aluminum sauce pot, cost landed $0.6970, instead of $0.40 as calculated in the "document," and shows a percentage of mark on to landed cost of 77.9 per cent, and not 210 per cent as stated in the "document." In this case again, items of expense incurred after the merchandise leaves the ship, as referred to above, are not included in this calculation of cost.

Exhibit 59, page 60, china dinner plate, the landed cost is $0.44, instead of $0.327 as stated in the "document," and the mark on 122.7 per cent instead of 199 per cent as specified in the "document." In this particular instance, however, it is our experience that a 22.9 per cent loss through breakage must be calculated upon, and if this were, as it legitimately should be, included in the cost of the merchandise the true cost would be $0.66, and the mark on 72.7 per cent instead of 199 per cent as specified in the "document." Here, again, items of expense incurred after the merchandise left the ship are not included.

The items are of comparatively small value, and the service element (handling, packing, delivering, etc.) is large, and the overhead of the distributer correspondingly heavy.

Department stores are interested to a very small extent in the sale of imported merchandise. I should say, roughly, that less than 5 per cent of their entire purchases are imported, and their interest lies in the prosperity of the country and in the reduction of the cost of living rather than its increase.

Very sincerely yours,

JESSE ISIDOR STRAUS.

LORD & TAYLOR,
New York, September 12, 1922.

Hon. OGDEN L. MILLS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MILLS: Thank you for your letter of August 31 and inclosures, which reached my office as I was leaving on September 6, and received my attention upon my return on the 11th.

As a premise on which we can agree, let us admit that a man enters business recognizing the fact that in a year's transactions he will lose money on some, make a small percentage of profit on others, and on still others make a large percentage of profit. As a further premise on which I think we will agree, let us say that we will judge this firm by the average of their profits at the end of the year, provided their business methods have been fair and equitable.

As instances of this principle, let us recall two or three cases. First, that of our railroads. The individual rates approved by our Interstate Commerce Commission are on the basis of what is necessary in each case to produce an equitable average return to the railroads. For example, silks will bear a much higher rate than will cement. Just because we pay a high rate per hundred pounds on silk, we do not say that the railroad rates are unduly high. At the end of the year we look over their results and see the workings of the law of averages, and reach a decision on that basis. In ocean traffic a vessel may be bound from one country to another with a cargo which will bear a very high freight rate. On the return trip there may be very little offered, and the ship may be obliged to take what can be secured at a very low rate. The owners are satisfied if the round trip nets them a fair profit, and certainly the practice is just to the public.

In life insurance a man may pay one year's premium on a policy, and in the case of his death within the year his estate will secure the face of his policy for a very small cost. However, in the case of a man who pays 40 installments the cost will be very high. In such cases we observe the law of averages, and judge the insurance company not on the basis of the policy on which it collected 40 installments but on its average experience over a period of years.

In all fairness these principles must be considered in the subject under discussion. We believe that during the last five years the importing lace business has been one of the most hazardous ventures in our line. In the case of practically all imported merchandise, including laces, it is necessary to order from six weeks to six months in advance, and in some cases even more. Hence style and color tendencies must be predicted far in advance—a risky and expensive necessity.

The New York importer, wholesale and retail, is the American pioneer in styles. When he brings in his selection, the public determines its choice, and then many of the initial risks in determining what is wanted are eliminated for the manufacturers, and also retailers in other cities. To select intelligently the buyer should see the whole market. This means heavy traveling expenses, and many of these pioneers maintain foreign offices.

With the best intention the buyer is frequently unfortunate in getting merchandise the public does not want. Consequently, to offset this loss the wanted things sell at a large profit, although the average is not excessive.

We have discussed the underlying principles of averages which is used in all successful business of volume that we might better understand the specific cases cited in the pamphlet.

Exhibit 44, metal-thread lace: We imported this article, but, having sold all our stock, purchased a small supply, of which this sale was a part, from an importer. Let us give you the record of our import: Cost, 70 cents and a fraction per yard in France, about $1.30½ per yard cost at the store.

This cost includes the following: Invoice price, duty paid, ocean freight charges, marine insurance, cartage from dock to store, foreign office expenses, buyer's traveling expenses.

The pamphlet estimate includes only invoice price, duty, insurance, and freight, and makes a landed cost of 97½ cents. These additional factors used by us to ascertain costs are all sound and based on experience.

It cost us $1.30½ per yard when imported. We sold all we bought in France to the retail trade at $2.25 per yard. It was a good item. The demand for it justified a purchase of the same merchandise from the importer, even at $2.25 per yard cost to us. This purchase from the importer was retailed by us at $3.50 per yard. Out of this lot the purchase in question was made.

Exhibit 46, burnt-out lace (trade name, imitation Venice): We never imported any of this direct. The only evidence we can give is from the importer to our customer. We did not stock this item, but when a customer called with a sample our buyer at once knew where it could be obtained and undertook to fill the order. The quotation from the importer was $1.25 per yard. The price asked the customer was $1.95, and was satisfactory, so we sent a messenger after the lace.

It may seem in the case of the metal-thread lace that the importer is making an abnormally high profit. We do not intend to reflect on him, for we do not believe that he has done either us or the public an injustice. As an illustration of the law of averages, we purchased from him during the same season the last of a lot of lace which he had at $2.60 per yard and sold it at $3.95 per yard. We had previously imported this lace ourselves at a cost of $5 per yard.

We have kept records of our foreign business, so that we know what the results have been. They are not, however, so kept that our certified public accountants could easily certify to them. They have prepared for us a statement, however, showing the percentage of net profit to sales for the years 1915 to 1921, inclusive. Enclosed is certificate herewith.

During the years 1918, 1919, and 1920 our foreign business lost money. The year 1921 we did slightly better on the foreign business than on the average business of the house, and in 1922 we hope to do slightly better still.

In answering the question in your letter I have no hesitancy in saying that I think the preparation and distribution of the pamphlet is unfair. While the figures, so far as they go, may be accurate, they are certainly incomplete and misleading. It almost looks as if a definite effort had been made to leave the impression that Lord & Taylor was making a gross profit of 259 per cent and 413 per cent, when such is not the case.

If there is anything more I can do to help you in this situation, please feel free to call on me.

Very truly yours,

NEW YORK, September 11, 1922.

Mr. SAMUEL W. REYBURN,
President Lord & Taylor, New York City.

DEAR SIR: We have made annual audits of the accounts of Lord & Taylor, covering the period from January 1, 1915, to December 31, 1921, and we certify that the net profits as shown by our reports rendered from year to year were as follows:

	Per cent.

The foregoing percentages represent net profits on total net sales of store after deduction of interest and Federal taxes.

Very truly yours,

LYBRAND, ROSS BROS. & MONTGOMERY.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, everyone desires to get through with this matter this evening, and after some consultation back and forth I will ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] if it will be acceptable to him to reduce the time on each side 20 minutes?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the time on each side be reduced 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be reduced 40 minutes, 20 minutes on each side. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL].

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I sympathize greatly with my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] in his endeavor to remain regular and justify his vote in spite of his argument against the bill. Half of his speech was a splendid eulogy of our good friend JOE FORDNEY, with which we all agree, and in the other half of his speech he criticized many items in the schedule and tried to justify his position as a Republican both in voting for the bill and opposing it on the floor.

It is because I am a Republican and a protectionist that I am going to vote against it. It is tariff gone mad which will not defend but offend the people of the country. It is unscientific. As for that, there never was a scientific tariff, either Republican or Democratic, and never will be, until we have a permanent tariff commission with powers to master and construct a tariff free from local and political influences. It is not economic, and it can not be, no matter which party is in control, as long as the facts are ignored and economic laws defied. It is a political blunder from a Republican standpoint, and there are protectionists by the thousands who are asking who is responsible. Those of us who have not lost our political perspective should do all we can to save the day, and in order that I may do my part for the best interests of the Republican Party I am going to vote against it. Let us speak the truth about the matter. It might be possible to pass this bill after the election and let the people get used to it by degrees and realize its benefits—those that it has—to offset those it has not, but if it becomes a law before election there are at least 25 Republican seats that will be lost just as sure as we sit here to-day, as it is bound to increase the price of practically everything we eat and wear.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] can not make it any more palatable by his motion to recommit with instructions as to dyes and potash. There are some schedules which can be defended but many others are indefensible. The four which have influenced my position more than any other are sugar, milk, cream, and potatoes; four articles that do not benefit nor affect any one section of the country more than another but every section alike and adversely because these articles form the basis of food supply for almost every family of wage earners. There is no question of the underpaid cow of Canada, or some other foreign cow, or the highly paid wage of our own cow, or the best pasture the cows have here or elsewhere.

These schedules are indefensible, and I do not think anyone on either side of the House will attempt to defend the duties that have been placed upon these four articles—cream, 20 cents a gallon; milk, 2½ cents per gallon; potatoes, 50 cents per hundredweight; buttermilk, 1 cent per gallon, and so forth. This in turn affects the price of butter, cheese, and oleomargarine and other substitutes, as well as the price of condensed milk, all of which I may say in passing carry an altogether too high rate of duty. The city of Boston and its suburbs received from Canada from 65,120 quarts of cream in December to 194,520 quarts in July, and 5,560 quarts of milk in December to 46,000 quarts in July. The New England States do not furnish a sufficient supply of milk for their own use even at the prevailing high price, and it is useless to talk about obtaining a supply from farther distant points than the Canadian border because of the prohibitive freight rates and the perishable nature of the articles.

As for sugar, the greatest part of our sugar is imported, and the per capita consumption has risen to 90 pounds per year, or an average of 450 pounds per year for every family.

This is considered one of the necessities of life, and this tariff raises the rate to such an extent that it will take millions of dollars from the pockets of consumers. The National Treasury will get approximately $75,000,000 in duty and the American people will contribute another $75,000,000 or thereabouts to the Sugar Trust.

Potatoes: Potatoes were free for 9 or 10 years, and the Payne-Aldrich bill only imposed a tariff of 25 cents per bushel. The emergency tariff carries the same rate. This bill carries a rate of 50 cents per 100 pounds, and on an approximately 1,000,000 bushels of potatoes consumed each day represents about $350,000 every day, or a total of $120,000,000 added to the food bill of the American people. The potato crop of the United States runs from three to four hundred million bushels a year, and although many bushels are exported there is considerable importation of potatoes from foreign countries, particularly in the spring of the year.

In addition to these indispensable food items I will merely mention a few others which may need a measure of protection, but many of which need none: Fresh beef and veal, 3 cents a pound; fresh mutton, 2½ cents; fresh lamb, 4 cents; bacon, ham, and pork shoulders, 2 cents; lards, compounds, and substitutes, 2 cents; live poultry, 3 cents a pound; dead poultry, 6 cents a pound; whole eggs, 4 cents a pound; wheat, 30 cents a bushel; wheat flour, 75 cents per 100 pounds; lemons, 2 cents a pound; almonds, unshelled, 4¾ cents a pound; shelled, 14 cents a pound; peanuts, unshelled, 3 cents a pound; shelled, 4 cents a pound; walnuts, unshelled, 4 cents a pound; shelled, 12 cents; peas, green or dried, 1 cent a pound; onions, 1 cent a pound; tomatoes, one-half of 1 cent a pound; turnips, 12 cents per 100 pounds.

I have said nothing about the cotton or woolen schedules, clothing, table and bed linen, underwear, blankets, and so forth, and time will not allow me to go into these items, but I wish to make the observation that generally the rates are higher than they need to be to provide adequate protection to the American manufacturer and working man. I do not claim that the duties on wool have been increased over the present rates, nor do I contend that the duty on wool, nor the duty on any one specific article, will materially raise the price; but I do contend that in passing this bill before election you are going to reap a different harvest from what you expect, and a crop of tares and tears instead of a crop of wheat and seats. It may be, as I said before, unscientific, uneconomic, and unwise to pass this bill perhaps at any time, but it is absolutely suicidal from a party standpoint to pass it just before election. History has shown that measures of this character can not be explained and the benefits established or enjoyed in such a brief period of time, and I firmly believe that the future will justify my position, from a political standpoint, and positively justify my position economically.

Mr. GARNER. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOWLING].

Mr. BOWLING. Mr. Speaker, this present tariff bill, H. R. 7456, is entitled "An act to encourage the industries of the United States and for other purposes." So far as an encouragement of industry is concerned, it would be impossible to select a greater misnomer, for instead of encouraging industry it will depress industry. It is fundamental that trade is the life of a nation and the exchange of goods has for all the centuries been recognized as a mark of prosperity. In presenting this bill to the House of Representatives in August, 1921, the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. FORDNEY, declared that one of its purposes was to restrict imports which, being interpreted, necessarily means that our trade with foreign nations is to be restricted. In proportion as this restriction is perfected our business is restricted, our industries paralyzed, and our prosperity reduced. Hence, instead of declaring that this is a bill to encourage industries, it could with greater propriety be denominated "A bill to restrict industries and to discourage prosperity."

There are many thousands of items in this bill. It never received consideration in the House of Representatives. But seven days were given for its consideration before the House in August, 1921. During that short space of time it was manifest that not one of the many schedules could receive real consideration. The bill was taken to the Senate in August, 1921, but remained in the Committee on Finance until April, 1922, when it was reported to the Senate. There it received its first real consideration. From April 11, 1921, until August 19, 1922, it was debated in that body. Here for the first time it was really discussed, its provisions analyzed, and its effect upon business and the people generally was first set forth.

There is no doubt that of all the monstrous robberies of the people of America by high tariff bills this is the worst. In comparison with it the McKinley bill and the Payne-Aldrich bill, both of unhappy memory, were but as a summer zephyr compared with a hurricane, for while these bills each in turn repudiated by the American people, robbed by retail, this latest demonstration of Republican rapacity robs by wholesale. There is hardly a single avenue of activity but must pay toll to the rapacity of the interests that have dictated this bill, and while it is declared that this bill will produce four hundred millions of revenue for the United States Treasury, there will be in excess of one billion in addition collected from the people of America by reason of increased costs.

Of the more than 10,000 items in the bill, I desire to discuss but one. In the short time that is allotted to me of these four hours of debate, I wish to call to the attention of the people of America but one provision that I consider to be more objectionable and the least defensible of all, and that is the provision which levies a duty of $30 per ton on potash. Potash is an essential ingredient of fertilizer extensively used by all of the farmers of America and absolutely essential in all farming industries. This bill for the first time in American history places a tax on fertilizer. We have had many tariff bills—the Morrill bill, the McKinley bill, the Wilson bill, the Dingley bill, the Payne-Aldrich bill, and the Underwood bill—and in all of these fertilizers were on the free list. It has heretofore been the universal policy of both the Democratic and Republican Parties to give to the farmers of the country free fertilizer.

Permit me to call to your attention the history of the potash industry in the United States. This was first inaugurated during the World War. Before that time potash was produced in Germany and laid down at our eastern seaboard at a price of $75 per ton of pure potash. When the Great War began, in 1914, German commerce was driven from the seas by the allied blockade and it was impossible for potash to be imported to the United States. This created a great dearth in fertilizer, and in an attempt to meet the demand for fertilizer certain companies began the manufacture of potash in Nebraska, Utah, and California. During the war period these companies so organized had a complete monopoly on potash and sold their products at the enormous and exorbitant price of $400 to $800 per ton. A well-known story in Alabama is told of a farmer who before the war period, having bought large quantities of fertilizer at the pre-war price, found hidden away under the general plunder of his farm storage house a half ton of potash which had cost him $150, and which at the war price he carried to his market and exchanged for a Ford car. This illustrates not only the enormous fluctuation of prices and the insatiate demand for fertilizer but also the absolute necessity for potash in our agricultural industry.

It is impossible at the present time to say just how many firms or how much money is engaged in the manufacture of potash, but we know that, however many there are, they are wholly unable to satisfy the domestic demand. We do not know how much capital is invested in this industry. It has been estimated that the capital ranges from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000. This is probably much greater than the real investment, but the present tax of $30 per ton will pay many times over every dollar that has ever been invested in the domestic production.

In 1916, 10,000 short tons of potash were produced in the United States. In 1917 this had risen to 32,000, in 1918 to 54,000, and in 1919 it dropped to 30,000. During the years of 1916, 1917, and 1918, while we were at war, about 96,000 tons of potash were produced in the United States. The producers had a complete monopoly and their product, as has been said, was sold at an average price of around $500 per ton. So during these years the domestic producers of potash received, in round numbers, $46,000,000 on an investment of $25,000,000. In a statement presented to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives in the year 1921 a representative of the potash producers declared that the basic cost for producing potash in 1920 was $204 per ton. When these same producers sold their product at an average of $500 they made a net profit of $296 per ton on their output of 96,000 tons, or a total value of more than $28,000,000. These figures show that these companies have already received back their entire capital, together with a reasonable profit, and now own their plants without cost to themselves.

The great producing areas of potash are found in Alsace-Lorraine. In this territory there are vast beds of potash, and nothing is required in the way of producing except to dig the raw material from the earth, place it aboard cars and ships, and send it out into the commerce of the world. In the United States, on the other hand, the potash is extracted by expensive processes from brines and kelps, which processes require large plants and great expense in the way of machinery, fuel, and overhead charges. It has been estimated beyond dispute that potash can be transported from Europe to the cities on our Atlantic seaboard at a rate not to exceed $5 per ton. The products of Nebraska and California will cost at least in freight rates around $20 per ton gross weight, and when we consider that only 20 per cent of the dead weight is potash, we observe that the freight rate on pure potash from Nebraska to the Atlantic seaboard is $100 per ton. Now, if we add $204 per ton as a cost of manufacturing to the $100 per ton freight to get it to the market, we see that the consumers, who are the cotton farmers of South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, will have to pay a basic price of at least $300 per ton to compete with the product of Alsace-Lorraine. Thus we see that the $30 per ton levied on imported potash is nothing more nor less than a pure gift of the whole American people to a few producers in Nebraska and California. It is absolutely without justification to require the millions of farmers of the United States to pay this tribute to a few individuals who have already drawn 100 per cent value from their investment and are now but a hothouse industry.

The normal consumption of potash in the United States is about 250,000 tons. At the highest estimate domestic producers can furnish only 50,000 tons, leaving 200,000 tons to be imported, and a tax of $30 a ton on these 200,000 tons will bring $6,000,000 in revenue to the Treasury, but this enormous sum of money is paid wholly by the farmers, and they will not only pay this amount but will likewise pay to the domestic producers of potash an amount that can not be estimated but which may be measured only by the greed of the producers of the domestic product. If this tax is not imposed, the farmers will get cheaper potash than ever before, for the potash beds are now owned by France, and France is eager for world trade and is reaching out in every direction to extend her foreign commerce. As compared with the United States, transportation charges in France are astonishingly cheap, and with the revival of business which will necessarily come in the progress of time every farmer in America can reap a benefit from the potash industry of France, which is more anxious than ever before to extend its trade.

It is a fact that is patent to all that at the present time agriculture languishes. Farmers are in despair. They see the productive capacity of their lands decreasing. They realize as never before the necessity for a cheap fertilizer to replenish their exhausted soils. Now, if we place this burden on agriculture it will be without excuse, and it will cause a further deterioration in land values and a reduction in agricultural products. If we are to reduce in any material degree the high cost of living, it will be necessary to increase production, and the simplest way to increase this production is to furnish a high-grade fertilizer to the farmers. The people of the great population and industrial centers, like Chicago, Detroit, New York, Boston, Philadelphia, are dependent on the farmers for food. They need fruits, cabbage, potatoes, tomatoes, corn, and wheat. Potash is an absolute essential to the successful growing of these products, and unless it can be secured at a reasonable price and in substantial quantities both production and quality will necessarily be reduced, and as a consequence the cost of living, already unconscionably high, will mount and mount as never before. The cotton farmers of the South and the cattle and wheat farmers of the West are to-day facing bankruptcy. No man can live to himself; no people and no nation can live to themselves. We are all dependent each upon the other. What we need is a fair distribution at a reasonable price of the necessities of living. Hence I appeal to-day to my colleagues of the House of Representatives to vote for a motion to recommit this bill to the Ways and Means Committee with instructions to place potash upon the free list, believing that in so doing we will be doing the greatest good to the greatest number. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, the favorite method of opposition to a tariff bill is not argument; it is abuse, denunciation, vigorous and vociferous condemnation. The present bill is denounced as a robber tariff, framed in the interest of the rich against the poor. It is charged to be full of "jokers" framed by unscrupulous manipulators to impose grievous and excessive burdens upon the backs of the people. Even my good friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], whom we all admire, commences his attack by violent denunciation of the bill. This led him to make some reckless statements. For instance, the gentleman from Texas said that the rates in the pending bill were higher than were ever before imposed by any tariff law in our history. That was a very extraordinary statement indeed.

To commence in good Democratic days, not so very long ago, the average tariff rates on all imports in 1893 were 23.79; in 1895, 20.44; in 1899, 29.48; in 1907, 23.28; in 1909, 22.99; in 1911, 20.29; in 1913, 17.69; in 1914, 14.88; in 1920, 6.38.

The average rates under the pending bill are 13.36. It will be noticed that this average is less than any other since 1893, except the last year under the Underwood tariff. The rates of the pending bill are lower than those of any other protective tariff measure ever passed in this country. So the denunciation of this bill, because it imposes extraordinary and exceptional high tariff rates, is not in the least justified.

On the other hand, we are asked to continue the lowest tariff that this country ever knew. Since the Government was instituted we have never before had a tariff with so low an average rate as 6.38 per cent. Not only is that true but the present tariff is by far the lowest of any nation in the world at the present time. All other nations since the war have raised their tariffs to protect their home industries. They have confined the purchases of their people wherever possible to their own products. They have raised rates, imposed embargoes, required licenses, and adopted every scheme possible to build again their injured industries.

Great Britain has been for years the model for all our tariff-for-revenue, free-trade advocates in America. It would be well for them to note her action since the war. In 1921 the British Parliament passed what they called "the safeguarding industrial act." By the terms of that act they placed a duty of 33.33 per cent on over 6,000 articles. Compared with that our robber tariff of 13.38 seems moderate, to say the least. Besides, the bill provides for an absolute embargo against dumping and against destructive competition from countries with depreciated currencies—and all countries have depreciated currencies except the United States. Provision is also made by which a license system can be instituted whenever necessary so that importations from any country can be refused unless a license is first obtained. Great Britain has also adopted a home valuation system, as has nearly every other country in Europe.

Belgium has imposed a tariff in some instances as high as 300 per cent on articles which it produces within its own borders. Germany allows no imports to come into its territory unless a license is first obtained upon terms which it fixes. Hungary and Switzerland have also adopted the license system. Poland and Spain have provided absolute embargoes upon all products they have reason to exclude. Most of these countries exclude all luxuries and most of them exclude all articles they themselves produce or manufacture, so as to completely protect their industries. Here in the United States we are proposing a tariff more moderate and liberal than any other protective tariff ever passed, and it is called the work of financial pirates and robber barons! Instead of denunciation, our Democratic friends ought to commend our moderation.

There are some of the rates in the pending bill which, in my judgment, are too high, and some which I think are too low. I would not impose a duty on fertilizer potash. Neither would I longer continue an embargo on dyes. I would place a duty on hides, if I could have my way, and there are other items which I do not approve. But these are only a few of the 10,000 items in the bill. On the whole it is well and wisely drawn and will amply justify itself in protecting and building up our industries. A believer in protection is justified in supporting it, because it is a protective tariff bill. I do not believe anyone is justified in voting against it because he is not pleased with some of its provisions or does not approve the rates on some few items. No general tariff bill could be formed that would meet with the approval of any person on every one of its thousands of items.

AMERICAN VALUATION.

From the first, ad valorem rates have been based upon the selling value of imported goods in the country of origin. When the House committee began its investigation it was realized that never before had it been so difficult as now to determine foreign values. It was found that European countries had discarded the foreign-valuation basis; that depreciated and constantly changing currencies made it practically impossible to determine here what foreign values are; that most of the goods now imported are undervalued and are not paying even the low duties now imposed; and that American producers are placed at a great disadvantage in competition with foreign competitors who are both defrauding the Government and seriously injuring our home producers.

For these and other reasons the House bill provided for levying duties upon the American wholesale selling price prevailing upon like or comparable products at the time actual importation is made. Unfortunately, this provision did not meet with the approval of the Senate. It refused to adopt the American-valuation plan and went back to foreign valuations.

with some modifications. As a result of this disagreement between the House and the Senate a compromise was worked out in conference providing for "flexible" provisions, by which the President was given authority to raise or lower rates within a limit of 50 per cent upon the advice of the Tariff Commission and to declare American valuation in cases where investigation showed that an American industry could not be protected by assessing duties on a foreign valuation.

This provision is a great improvement over the present law and should be given a fair trial. It is generally admitted that in some way provision should be made for changes in items in a tariff without waiting for and requiring a general revision. A general revision always disturbs and injures business. It raises a political issue which should be avoided if possible. Great economic changes within the next few years will occur all over the world. Rates which are now justified may be too high or too low next year. Rates fixed by the present bill if it becomes a law should not be considered as final, but changes should be made from time to time as need arises. This is provided for in the present bill.

Two objections are urged against this provision; one that the provision is unconstitutional for the reason that Congress is granted exclusive power to legislate on this subject and can not delegate it to the President. To this it may be answered that Congress establishes in the provision a standard that the rate shall be the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, and that in making changes the President will not legislate but will only determine the fact, which can properly be delegated by Congress to the President.

The other objection urged is that it is unwise and unsafe to grant such power to the President. The provisions of the bill require that the President before making any change must have the approval of the Tariff Commission, which must investigate the proposed change and must have public hearings and give opportunity for all interested to appear and be heard. Under these conditions the exercise of arbitrary power is fully guarded against.

If these provisions are sustained in the courts and prove satisfactory in application they will probably be continued. If not, another method should be adopted to bring about the same result. If provision were made that each year, at the beginning of the regular December session, the Tariff Commission should recommend to Congress such changes as it would advise, together with a full statement of the reasons therefor, Congress could act directly on such recommendations. This would answer the constitutional objection. It would provide for the consideration of changes as often as they ought to be made and prevent the continuance of unjustifiable rates for long periods. It would prevent the apprehension and uncertainty of unexpected changes, and it would prevent the economic disturbances and political upheavals which always accompany general revisions.

PROTECTED FARM PRODUCTS.

The tariff act of 1913 placed most of the principal agricultural products on the free list. During the short time it was in operation before the World War, and in still greater degree after the war, the damaging effects of this policy were made manifest. Agricultural imports began to flow in great quantities from foreign lands. To stem this flood of wool, mutton, cattle and hides, wheat and corn, butter and eggs, fruits and vegetables which were being imported, to the destruction of the farmers' market, the Sixty-sixth Congress passed an emergency farm tariff bill, which, however, was vetoed by President Wilson. One of the first laws passed by the Sixty-seventh Congress when Mr. Harding became President was an emergency tariff act, which became a law May 27, 1921. Its provisions, with slight changes, are merged into the bill which we are now considering.

In these laws agriculture is more adequately protected than ever before. The demand for "free raw material," which has seemed so potent in the past, was made to include the farmer's finished products. But the farmer's economic equality has at last been recognized. It has been claimed, and with justification, that in the past while manufactures were carefully looked after and sometimes overprotected, agricultural interests were often overlooked or sacrificed. That can not be said of the present tariff bill. The farmers are as fully protected as are the manufacturers. It is in this regard truly an all-American tariff.

And that is at it should be. America consumes 92 per cent of all it produces. To impair or sacrifice this market would be folly. To give up our home market, which is the best in the world, for the encouragement of foreign trade would be not only a poor but a perilous policy. Prosperity must be made in the United States; it can not be imported. We must have active mills with all men employed at an American wage in order to make and keep a ready and profitable market for the farmer's products. We must also have prosperous farmers with fair and reasonable prices for their products in order to furnish a ready demand for the manufactured products of the country. Upon the general prosperity which will thus be brought about we can go out to win the markets of the world. But without it we shall lose what we have and fail to gain even a subordinate place in foreign trade.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON].

DEPRECIATED CURRENCY AND LOW WAGES ABROAD NECESSITATE A PROTECTIVE TARIFF FOR AMERICA.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, for almost a century, in fact since 1832, we find the two great political parties differing on the question of a protective tariff. At that time John C. Calhoun, who prior thereto had been a protectionist, declared for free trade and became an ardent free trader, contending that a protective tariff only benefited the manufacturing interests of New England, where most manufactories were then located. That the South being solely an agricultural country, engaged in the raising of cotton, the large part of which was sold to the mills of England, that the planters of the South should buy their tools and supplies from England, from whom he claimed they could buy cheaper than they could from the Northern States. And strange as it may seem, this same policy advocated by Calhoun in 1832 prevails generally throughout the South to-day. We still find the Representatives in Congress from the Southern States practically a unit with the Democratic Party in advocating free trade and opposing a protective tariff. It is only when the question of long cotton, sugar, rice, or peanuts is under consideration that we find them favoring a protective duty—it is for their products and their products only that they favor a tariff.

It is true that other questions have arisen in the past on which the two great parties differ, but the protective tariff has ever been one of the main ones, and largely upon that question the Southern States now have in the two branches of Congress 97 Democrats, while from those same States there are only 4 Republicans.

From the adoption of the Constitution the most prosperous times this country has enjoyed have always been when we had a protective tariff law in force; that not only raised revenue sufficient to meet the expenses of our Government, but also protected our manufactures and workmen against the competition of the underpaid workmen of Europe and Asia.

Recognizing the fact that a protective tariff encourages and makes possible manufactures, diversifies industries, develops our national resources, gives a fair profit to capital and remunerative employment to labor, and above all makes us independent in time of peace or war, the master minds that laid the foundation of our Government almost immediately declared for a protective tariff.

The first protective tariff bill was passed July 4, 1789, and was the second bill passed by Congress and approved by Washington. It stated that—

Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debt of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods and wares imported—

And so forth. And from that time until the present the doctrine of protection and that stated by Washington in his Farewell Address—of no complicated alliances with foreign powers—have done more to make the United States first and foremost of all nations than all other policies combined.

History reveals the fact that the panics of 1837, 1857, and 1892 were all the result of Democratic free trade, or so-called tariff for revenue only, and that our most prosperous times have ever been when we had a protective tariff.

The panic of 1892, when the so-called Wilson-Gorman bill was enacted by the Grover Cleveland administration, will long be remembered by all. The cities were divided into districts, in each of which soup and bread were provided for the hungry and shoes and clothing for the needy. The unemployed were encamped on public grounds in our cities and marching with Coxey's army on Washington with banners saying, "It is work we want, not charity."

No longer ago than 1913, under the Underwood tariff bill passed in Wilson's administration, you recall the unemployed took possession of the churches in New York City and demanded bread to prevent starvation, but the war coming on did what the Wilson-Underwood free trade bill failed to do—stopped importations and furnished employment for all at enormous wages.

A duty, or tariff as it is called, equal to the difference in the cost of production of an article here and abroad is absolutely essential if we are to manufacture the article in this country. Capital will invest in the manufacture at the place where it will bring the best returns. It is easy to send money by draft, but labor is fixed, and the house that is being paid for can not be moved.

Never before in this country was there the necessity for a protective tariff there is to-day, for never has there been the difference in the cost of producing an article in this country compared with producing the same article in Europe as there is to-day, owing to the difference in wages paid and the value of the currency with which they are paid, which in several countries is practically worthless, with no purchasing power whatsoever.

In Germany, for instance, the mark has depreciated 99 per cent, and the average wage, measured in our money, is less than one-tenth what is received here for the same kind of employment; and the same condition prevails in other countries of Europe and Asia; hence any article produced there can be sold for one-eighth what it would cost here. We must, therefore, either cease to produce, reduce our wages to a point to meet the foreign competition and our manner of living accordingly, or levy a protective duty equal to the difference of the cost of production there and here, which the foreign-produced article must pay before it can be sold in our market, and the amount thus received by the Government pays that much of the cost of running the Government that otherwise must be paid by our citizens.

Many of our most prosperous industries owe their existence to a protective tariff. Many remember when all white crockery and earthenware were decorated with the lion and the unicorn, and all pearl buttons, steel rails, and many other articles were made abroad and sold here at enormous profits to the foreign manufacturer and importer. It is only since 1890, when the so-called McKinley bill was passed, that tin plate, silk velvets, plush, and so forth, were manufactured in this country. Prior thereto they could hardly be had at any price, and now every 5 and 10 cent store sells American-made crockery and tinware, and the manufacture thereof gives employment to thousands of American citizens.

And thus has it been with practically all our great industries. A protective tariff equal to the difference in the cost of production here and abroad gave us our opportunity to compete in our own market with foreign producers and importers, and our own ndustries and lower prices are the result. It is when the fires burn brightest in the furnaces that the greatest happiness prevails around the firesides in the homes. Let the furnaces cease to burn and all business is at a standstill; ten men are looking for work where one is employed half time. Little difference does it make to the man out of employment whether or not the articles he desires would be possibly a little cheaper under free trade than it is, if he has nothing with which to buy. Rents and taxes do not stop when the goods that should be made here are being made abroad. Capital can wait, but the laborer must receive his wages or starve.

Why is it that the northern cities as a class have grown so much faster than those of the South, and why is it that Cleveland especially is known as a city of homes, and that so large a percentage of its workmen become home owners?

It is evidently due to its location and surroundings, where the coal from the South meets the iron ore from the North, and the fact that the protective tariff maintained by the Republican Party has enabled its industries to develop and diversify and given employment to its workmen. Its growth each year during the past 40 years, while the Republicans were in power, has been a surprise to all.

When we think of the number employed before a ton of iron ore becomes a finished product we see how dependent one is upon another—the miners of the iron ore and the coal, those engaged in transportation, and the men at the furnace—and what it would mean to the American citizens to have this work done abroad. And how could the department store that is importing its stock make sales if the workman does not receive sufficient wages with which to live as an American ought?

Protection means prosperity, the putting of men to work in the mills and factories and on the farm, the paying of good wages under good working conditions, while free trade is advocating the doing of the work in the country in which the laborer can be hired at less wages.

The true American loves his home and fireside, and his great desire is to see his children educated and live at least as well as he does. Immigrants come to this country to better their condition, and especially that of their children. They soon learn that the homes they see about them belong to those they knew but a few years before in the country from which they came, and they seek to follow their example.

No city in the Union is benefited more by a protective tariff than is Cleveland. There was a time when Pittsburgh was the center of the iron industry, but to-day Cleveland leads not only in iron but many other industries, all more or less dependent upon a protective tariff.

Not only the North but the entire country has prospered, so that when Europe was practically bankrupt we were enabled not only to put one of the largest and best armies in the field that the world has ever seen, but at the same time loan Europe $10,000,000,000 in money at 4½ per cent interest, and now those same countries, recognizing what has made us strong, are following our example. England for the first time has a protective tariff on over 6,000 articles of 33⅓ per cent, with power given in a law passed in 1921–22 to raise it to 66⅔ per cent on any article of foreign manufacture being imported at less than the cost of production in Great Britain, plus a reasonable profit.

If a mistake is made in the rate of duty it is certainly far better that the mistake be in favor of the American laborer. The record of the Republican Party has ever been one of action. It has never failed to assume responsibility and act where the American workman's wages were at stake, and to keep the fires in our mills burning and the men employed. On the other hand, free trade never built a home in America but has enabled importers to pocket the profits that belonged to the American workman.

We must not forget that as a result of the war we now have an indebtedness of about $24,000,000,000, which must be paid with interest. Shall we pay it by a direct tax upon all or let the foreigner, seeking the right to sell his wares here, pay it for the privilege of selling in our market?

It is a well-known fact that unless the manufacturers and workmen prosper the farmer can not prosper, as the city furnishes the market for the farmer and the farmer the living for the workman; they are mutually dependent, and what helps one helps the other.

If the workman in the city is without work, as he must necessarily be if the goods are produced abroad and imported for less than they can be produced in the United States, then the workman has nothing with which to buy, much less with which to purchase a home and educate his children. Every one is benefited by a protective tariff.

There is hardly an industry in Cleveland, or its vicinity, that is not specially benefited by the so-called Fordney-McCumber bill, nor is there a city in the country that has more industries, and I doubt if there is any that has as many.

The people here are not satisfied with mere existing. Had they been they would never have left their old homes and friends. They came to better their conditions and especially that of their children. Every parent desires a home with children about the fireside, and that they become educated and valuable members of society, and this is what a protective tariff assists every one to obtain in America.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Texas use some of his time?

Mr. GARNER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, we Democrats believe that a tariff bill should be framed for the purposes of revenue to meet the expenses of the National Government, and should not embrace duties intended for the benefit of any privileged class. We believe in equal rights to all and special privileges to none, but you Republicans are endeavoring to tax the people for the ultimate purpose not to raise revenue, but to create subsidies, benefits, and advantages to certain privileged classes who have grown fat at the expense of the people.

I can not sit idly by and permit the passage of this tariff measure, which I consider the greatest burden ever levied upon the backs of the consuming public of our land. Its ultimate results will be to relieve those best able to defray the expenses of government and place it upon the shoulders of the toiling masses of the country. I have always contended and voted to place the burdens of the National Government upon the shoulders of those best able to carry it. This bill, however, rests the expense with greater force upon the shoulders of the man and his family who earn their livelihood by the sweat of their brows than upon the shoulders of the man who at the head of great concerns is living in luxurious elegance and amid palatial surroundings throughout the land.

It will again, as did the Payne-Aldrich tariff, place the people at the mercy of all those monopolies and profiteers who have grown fat under special legislation and special privileges. When this House originally passed this tariff bill, the people of the land believed it was more in the nature of a measure to be eventually thrashed out and perfected by the Senate and subsequently by the conference committee. The result, however, has been that we receive a bill just as iniquitous, just as burdensome, and just as unfair to the American consumer, and creating just as great charge upon those absolute necessities of life as did the harum-scarum monstrosity which was so hurriedly passed without discussion, then known as the Fordney tariff bill.

This bill will erect about us a tremendous tariff wall. It will absolutely prevent the great trade relations which we have had with foreign lands, and which has under this administration dropped from $8,080,480,821 in the calendar year of 1920 to $3,770,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922—less than half. The time was when the great mass of our population lived upon the farms, but to-day some 71 per cent of the people live within the cities. We have become a great manufacturing Nation. We manufacture far more than our people can possibly consume, and it was for this reason that President McKinley years ago maintained that we must find an outlet for these excess products of the people, and yet to-day we are building a tariff wall higher than any which this country has ever erected. We want foreign trade, and yet you enact legislation which prevents it. You tell us that we should have a subsidized merchant marine, to which I am opposed, and yet to-day you are placing upon the statute books an act which will positively prevent the success of any merchant marine.

The worst part of it is that you place this upon the shoulders of the people at a time when they are least able to bear it, at a time when business is practically at a standstill, when thousands of our people are out of employment, when men strain their minds and exert their nerves and muscles in an endeavor to secure the wherewithal to meet their just obligations, and to feed and clothe those dependent upon them. This is not merely an expression of my own, but of prominent Republicans as well.

Senator CUMMINS (Republican), of Iowa, said:

I think this is the most inopportune time of all times I have ever known to enact a general revision of the tariff law. If I could have had my way I would have allowed the existing tariff law to remain as a general law upon the subject.

Senator TOWNSEND (Republican), of Michigan, said:

I recognize the fact that this is about the most unfavorable time imaginable to revise the tariff.

Senator MCCUMBER (Republican), of North Dakota, in charge of the bill, said:

We have often been advised, and the advice is well founded, that of all times in our history this is the very worst time to formulate and put into effect a new tariff measure.

Columns and pages could be quoted from the leading Republican papers of the country in denunciation of this measure, which the New York Herald (Republican) calls "Damned fool protection."

I consider one of the most dangerous provisions of this tariff bill is that which delegates to the President the taxing power. That provision vests in the President the power to raise or lower the tariff rates fixed by Congress.

Our Constitution delegates the powers to be exercised by the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of the Government. This surrender by Congress of its taxing power to the President I believe is not alone unconstitutional, but a very dangerous precedent indeed. It will demoralize business by its uncertainty and defer prosperity.

It is to be regretted that the Republican Party has seen proper to go so far afield from all the provisions of the Constitution and the traditions of more than a hundred years. This is but a measure in the interest of the rich, framed by the millionaires of Congress, and will result in the aggrandizement of those vast corporations and individual enterprises which have under every Republican administration preyed upon the people through tariff taxation.

When we realize that this bill will place upon the people an additional tax of $3,000,000,000 to $4,000,000,000, according to how the special privilege class take advantage of their opportunity, it is discouraging indeed that out of this vast burden and expense to the consumer the Government will not receive more than some 9 per cent, around $350,000,000. It gives to special privileged and profiteering classes an enormous profit while the Government receives comparatively little as revenue. It can not but vastly increase the cost of living, which is certainly high enough as it is without this additional burden.

We Democrats and certain progressive Republicans beat the iniquitous potash tax of $15 per ton, which would have cost the farmer $45,000,000. We likewise beat the dye embargo, which was in the interest of the Chemical Foundation and other combines, and yet under this bill, while the embargo is not direct, the tax is so heavy that it will operate as an embargo against the importation of many foreign products.

The nations of Europe, who owe us $11,000,000,000, are practically bankrupt. If they can not trade with us, certainly they can not pay this debt. It would appear that the passage of this law at such a time is but the payment by the Republicans of the pledge they made to secure election in 1920. It remains to be seen whether the voters will condone the offense or whether they will say to them "You have been weighed in the balance and found wanting." The privileged and favored classes through the election of 1920 were restored to power and control. It remains for the people to say whether they shall continue in that position. I take it the laboring classes already know the position of the administration in reference to them. I hope the balance of the people, if they have not already learned what the present administration stands for, will awake before the general election.

FOOD.

For information and as an exhibit allow me to mention some of the necessaries and the duties thereon:

Sugar, which pays a duty of 1.25 cents a pound (with a provision for its ultimate free entry) will hereafter be taxed 1.76 cents a pound for Cuban and 2.02 cents a pound for all other foreign kinds.

The increase in the tariff on sugar will give the Sugar Trust not less than $200,000,000 additional profits each year.

Beef (fresh), now free, will be taxed 3½ cents a pound hereafter.

This tax will enlarge the profits of the Beef Trust by some $231,000,000—about $11.35 per family—each year. Good "killing" for the Beef Trust.

Lamb (fresh), now free, taxed 5 cents a pound.

Mutton (fresh), now free, taxed 2½ cents a pound.

Pork (fresh), now free, taxed three-fourths cent a pound.

Bacon, hams, and shoulders, now free, taxed 2 cents a pound.

Lard, now free, taxed 2 cents a pound.

Poultry (live), now pays 1 cent a pound, will pay 3 cents a pound.

Eggs, now 3 cents a dozen, to be taxed 8 cents a dozen.

Milk (fresh), now free, will be taxed 2½ cents a gallon. Tax the babies.

Butter, pays 2½ cents a pound under present law. Will be taxed 8 cents.

Wheat flour, now free, is to be taxed $1.56 a barrel. This grab of millions annually goes to the big millers and food speculators.

Oatmeal, now pays 30 cents a hundredweight; new tariff will tax 90 cents—300 per cent higher.

Cereal breakfast foods, now free, are to be taxed 25 per cent ad valorem.

Irish potatoes, now free, to pay 58 cents a hundredweight.

CLOTHING.

Men's woolen suits will cost at least from $4 to $6 more this autumn than they cost last year.

Men's woolen overcoats will cost from $5 to $15 more this autumn.

The Fordney-McCumber bill has given the Wool Trust a fine chance to repay the farmer and worker for the "protection" the latter thought they got.

The Wool Trust has already sent out notices to customers that the prices of fabrics needed for men's and women's warm winter clothing will be advanced about 35 per cent, even before the Republican President has signed the Republican tariff bill. "Get your protection early" is the Wool Trust's slogan.

This in the face of coal shortage.

Jacquard waistings (greatly used by women and children) now pay 5 to 6 cents a yard. Will be taxed 13.78 cents a yard. Increase, 130 per cent.

Colored cotton sateens (used as a substitute for silk linings and women's underclothing) now pay 11 cents a yard. Will pay 28 cents. Increase more than 150 per cent.

Ginghams now pay 20 per cent ad valorem. Will be taxed an average of 49 per cent.

Woolen knit underwear now pays 35 per cent ad valorem. Will be taxed from 39 cents a pound plus 30 per cent ad valorem to 49 cents a pound plus 55 per cent ad valorem. Increase from 20 to 150 per cent.

Cotton corsets: Present duty, 30 per cent; new tax, 64 per cent ad valorem.

Cotton hosiery: Qualities now paying $1.50 a dozen increased under new bill to $2.45 a dozen.

Cotton gloves (for women): Present duty, $2 to $5.50 a dozen pairs. This to be increased from $9 to $45 a dozen pairs.

(The Fordney-McCumber bill raises the duty from $5.40 to $27 per dozen pairs, which in some instances is more on a single pair than the present tariff on a dozen pairs.)

Women's woolen dress goods now pays from 25 to 35 per cent ad valorem. Under new bill will pay from 74½ to 115 per cent ad valorem.

Women's woolen garments of all kinds will pay proportionate increases.

THE SEWING CIRCLE.

Sewing machines, now on free list, are to be taxed for those under $75 at 25 per cent ad valorem, and for those above $75,

40 per cent ad valorem. (Of course, she will not use an imported machine, but she will pay the Sewing Machine Trust at least this much more than she would have to pay now for an American-made machine.)

Needles, now taxed at 20 per cent ad valorem, will have to pay 30 per cent ad valorem—50 per cent more.

Scissors now pay 30 per cent ad valorem; will have to pay 20 cents a pair plus 55 per cent ad valorem—about 60 per cent more.

Hooks and eyes now pay 15 per cent ad valorem; will have to pay 4½ cents a pound plus 25 per cent ad valorem.

Buttons: Present rate, 15 per cent ad valorem. New tax, 20 per cent ad valorem plus specific duty of a twelfth to three-fourths of a cent per line per gross, a big increase.

Thread now pays 15 per cent ad valorem. Will have to pay hereafter one-half cent per 100 yards, an increase of over 100 per cent. (The American Thread Co., one of the lesser trusts favored by the Fordney-McCumber bill, earned profits of $19,200,000 from 1912 to 1919 on a capitalization of $6,000,000. It will be even more prosperous now.)

FURNITURE.

House or cabinet furniture, now taxed at 15 per cent ad valorem, will have to pay 60 per cent ad valorem, 300 per cent more.

HOUSEHOLD WARE.

Aluminum household utensils now pay 35 per cent ad valorem. New duty, 15 cents a pound and 60 per cent ad valorem. (The Aluminum Co. of America, a monopoly, is a concern in which Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, was serving as a director when he entered President Harding's Cabinet.)

Iron and steel household ware now taxed at 35 per cent ad valorem. New duty is 5 cents a pound and 50 per cent ad valorem. (The Steel Trust gets this big increase.)

Copper and brass household ware: Present duty, 20 per cent ad valorem. New tax, 50 per cent ad valorem. (Nice little profit here.)

Earthenware, common yellow and brown, now pays 15 per cent ad valorem. New tax, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Earthenware, decorated yellow and brown: Present duty, 20 per cent ad valorem. New tax, 40 per cent ad valorem, 100 per cent increase.

China, porcelain, etc.: Present duty, 50 per cent ad valorem. New tax, 60 per cent. (While it taxes plain china in general use, it will be noted decorated china, such as Royal Doulton, and so forth, is not taxed. This is also in the interests of the rich.)

Cocoa-fiber mats: Present duty, 3 cents per square foot. New tax, 7 cents a square foot.

Floor oilcloths: Present duty, 20 per cent ad valorem. New tax, 35 per cent ad valorem.

MEDICINES.

Some of the common medicines which the Fordney-McCumber bill taxed and the extortionate degree of the duties are here given:

Calomel, present duty, 15 per cent; new tax, 45 per cent ad valorem. Increase, 200 per cent.

Epsom salts now pay one-tenth of a cent a pound. New tax, one-half cent a pound. Increase, 500 per cent.

Every mother of a teething or delicate baby uses bismuth. So much the worse for that mother and her baby. Consider:

Bismuth, now pays 10 per cent ad valorem. The new duty is 45 per cent ad valorem.

Medicinal magnesia—a common household remedy—present duty, 3½ cents a pound; new tax, 7 cents a pound.

Castor oil, present duty, 12 cents a gallon; new tax, 8 cents a pound—a heavy increase.

Even our balm of Gilead has been made harder to get just when the Republican tariff and other Republican legislation has made it more necessary than ever.

Balm of Gilead, free under present Democratic tariff law, is now to be taxed 10 per cent ad valorem. Good-by, balm of Gilead.

SOME FREE-LIST ITEMS.

Senator Raynor, of Maryland, used to extol the fact that "divi-divi" was on the free list in the Payne-Aldrich tariff. I heard a story the other night: It was said that the home of a prominent Senator from Kansas had been burned, and he went out to see what damage had been done. He found that the home and all the outbuildings had been destroyed, but he wired back to his wife saying, "Home and all outbuildings have been burned, but, thank God, we have saved the well."

It looks to me as though everything from the cradle to the grave has been heavily taxed in the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill. I can voice the words of the Senator in saying, "Thank God, we have saved divi-divi on the free list."

I also find on the free list manna, asafetida, broken bells, gall nuts, dried blood, insect eggs, cuttlefish bone, dried insects, fish skins, fossils, leeches (I hope the fossils and leeches will not injure our own industry), loadstones (something attractive), skeletons, and spunk—I am glad to see they have allowed "spunk" to come in free, and I verily believe the people of the country will have sufficient "spunk" to dislodge this do-nothing Republican Congress, so mentioned by Secretary Weeks. [Applause.]

The New York World tells us that in October next there will be a great dinner at the Astor Hotel in New York in honor of and as a testimonial to Senator SMOOT for having landed these heavy taxes on the American people, and especially $200,000,000 in sugar tax. The tax barons and lords from all over the country will gather to do him honor. It will be a veritable Belshazzar's feast, of which we have read and sung so much, and I predict that there will be a handwriting on the wall directed by the American consumer, and that handwriting will be interpreted in full measure on the 7th of November following. To the Republicans I predict the voters will say, as did the handwriting over against the candlestick upon the plaster of the wall at the feast of Belshazzar "Mene, mene, tekel." [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, of course it is impossible for me or anyone else to discuss intelligently or unintelligently any part of this great bill, but there is one particular feature to which I desire to call attention, showing some of the glaring absurdities that exist in this bill. I refer to paragraph 717. The Ways and Means Committee after careful investigation put into the tariff bill a $350 tariff duty on silver black foxes. Whether that was right or wrong has nothing to do with my argument. It went to the Senate. The Senate changed the rate from $350 to $200 and reported the bill to the Senate. After the bill had been reported to the Senate the Finance Committee struck it out, and so the bill came back to this House with nothing in it at all, and yet our conferees have agreed to leave unprotected this infant industry which needs protection; and if protection is what we believe it is, for the purpose of fostering in this country an infant industry, our conferees will have difficulty in justifying to me and to the producers of silver black foxes how they can come back to the House without any provision made in the bill for their protection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman know what is the duty?

Mr. SNYDER. The present duty is 15 per cent ad valorem. If the gentleman has any knowledge of this industry and——

Mr. LONGWORTH. I know some cost $2,500, and 15 per cent is a pretty high duty.

Mr. SNYDER. You can buy them all the way from $50 to $500; the gentleman knows that. You can bring in a $50 fox and disintegrate the flocks, and that is what has been done. I am for the bill just the same, notwithstanding that.

Mr. GARNER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD] such time as he may desire.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, when I came to Congress, nearly four years ago, I found that an effort was being made to put a tax or tariff on fertilizer potash, and one of the first speeches made by me on this floor was against this effort to make heavier the farmer's burdens.

Nearly all the Members of Congress from farming sections united against this move and we have been successful in keeping this tariff off of potash to this good hour. Now, are we at last to fail and is the permanent tariff bill—now about to become law—to carry a duty on this essential ingredient of fertilizer? Is this Congress to fail to give the farmers the rural credit system they are entitled to; fail to give them a good marketing system for their products; fail to help them get cheaper nitrates for their fertilizers by fumbling with the Muscle Shoals proposition, and then crown these inexcusable failures by the overt act of placing a duty on fertilizer potash? I certainly hope not.

I have talked to many of the Members of this Congress about this matter, and I know the majority here are opposed to a tariff on potash, and yet we are about to pass a bill containing a provision the majority does not want. Why is this? Is it possible for the smaller number here to control the larger number? This is what is about to happen. Instead of the dog wagging the tail, the tail is about to wag the dog. Why is this about to happen? Simply because the leaders on the majority side are shrewd enough to mix bad proposals, which the leaders want, with propositions which a majority of Congress wants.

Many vicious measures are passed because they are sugar-coated with something which many Members here desire. I do not believe a measure to put a tariff on fertilizer potash could possibly pass this House, standing alone and as one independent proposition. I know it has not passed for nearly four years when offered alone. But now the conferees on this tariff bill have put this iniquitous proposal back in the bill with the hope that Members of the House and Members of the Senate will hold their noses and vote for the conference report as a whole, even though they object to a tariff on potash simply because there are thousands of items in the bill which the majority of Members here want. There is, I think, no reason for me to argue now the great injustice to our farmers of a tariff on potash. I have already argued this fully on at least three occasions heretofore. I am thoroughly convinced that enough men here agree that this proposal is nothing short of outrageous, and are bitterly opposed to this tariff to defeat this item if standing alone. The thing that I am afraid of is that many of the opponents of tariff on potash will, for the moment, forget our farmers in the mad rush to get a tariff on some other article which they desire on the dutiable list. Let us not forget our farmers on this proposition. Let us all put our shoulders to the wheel and get potash put on the free list, and then the tariff bill will pass in less than 10 days. The conferees will not tie up the bill, even for a week, because we strike out the duty on potash. If the conferees hold it up for this reason they will be to blame; not us. They had no business restoring the duty on potash. They knew the majority of us were opposed to it. They are trying to cram it down our throats. Let us not allow such treatment. We will have a chance to vote this duty off of potash. Mr. GARNER of Texas, who has charge of this bill for the Democrats, will at the proper time make a motion to recommit this conference report to the conferees with instructions to the conferees to strike out the proposed dye embargo and to put fertilizer potash on the free list. I am heartily in favor of this motion to recommit.

Many are opposed to the dye embargo but care nothing about the potash proposition. Many are opposed to a tariff on potash and care little or nothing about the dye embargo. Many, like myself, oppose both. Let us pull together when the time comes and put over the motion to recommit, and the farmers back home will, with one acclaim, say "Well done," for they will know we have rendered them and theirs a real service. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, we are protectionists out my way, and we will support this bill, although we preferred the bill of the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. FORDNEY. Most of the leading Democrats out our way are inclined to favor a protective tariff, just as they join us in favoring a heavy restriction of immigration. [Applause.] We favor protection for the products of the field, of the mine, and the factory, and also we favor protection for the man on the job. We see at close range the Canadian game of grabbing our market, and we see the Japanese and Chinese engaged in unloading their cheaply made products on us. We know that Germany, Austria, and other countries do the same.

I regret that the House conferees have been forced to continue shingles on the free list. On the passage of the Underwood Tariff Act in 1913 the shingle industry of western Washington collapsed. About 400 mills in the district I have the honor to represent shut down, and more than that many new ones were set up in British Columbia. During the war the shingle business in the Pacific Northwest revived. War prices and loose money prevailed. The effort to find spruce at $200 or more per 1,000 feet tore great holes in our forests and downed cedar to be immediately used for shingles. Just now the shingle industry again has its back against the wall, competing against every kind of shingle substitute from the paper-tarred roofing to the asbestos and slate roofings, with 10-hour Canadian competition thrown in under the Underwood Act, and to be continued under this bill as a result of a conference for which no member of the House is to blame.

Representatives HADLEY, HAWLEY, and TIMBERLAKE, the western members of the Ways and Means Committee, have done everything possible to prevent free trade in shingles. HADLEY, especially, was responsible for securing in the House the 50-cent rate, which was little enough. He presented the facts, overcame the opposition, and the House sustained him, proving the rights of our position. I desire publicly to congratulate my colleague, an ever-faithful attendant on the sessions of the House, for having done his full part. I might remind him that my illustrious predecessor, the late Hon. Francis W. Cushman, was promoted to the Ways and Means Committee, and after years of service was obliged to assist in bringing out a previous tariff bill in which his item, lumber, was slaughtered. On that occasion Cushman made his famous speech about the boy and the potatoes, wherein the farmer asked the boy, "What do you get for digging these potatoes," and the boy answered, "Nothing if I do and hell if I don't." I would remind certain Republicans on this floor that because Cushman lost his item he did not sulk in his tent nor did he assault the general tariff bill. The people of Washington never lost faith in Cushman. Cushman did his part. HADLEY has done his part and the others of the Washington delegation, including myself, have done our parts.

The 50-cent duty on shingles—the House rate—was lost in the Senate, and lost in conference after a fight because certain Mississippi Valley interests, aided and abetted by American lumber interests who have acquired Canadian timber, think they can get cheaper shingles in the future with Republican free trade added to Democratic free trade. I deny it. I am sorry that influences have operated to eliminate the duty on shingles—one influence being the belief of some that with free trade continued the price of shingles to the American consumer will be decreased, or at least will be held without increase. What folly!

The fact is that to-day, as shown by market reports I hold before you, shingles are selling $1 per thousand higher at the mills in Vancouver, British Columbia, than in Seattle, Tacoma, and Portland. The conference committee has declined to save the American shingle industry from British Columbian competition. It can not by such action save the American consumer one single red cent. Free trade never did. It can, and doubtless it will, effect the removal of American shingle mills to Canada. It can, and doubtless it will, shut down some American mills which can not meet the coolie labor competition of Canadian mills. It may shut down American mills which can not maintain the American eight-hour day in competition with the Canadian ten-hour day. But mark you, Mr. Speaker, the conference committee, by giving up a duty on shingles, will not save the consuming public a cent; will not reduce the price of shingles, and will not prevent an increase of shingle prices according to the law of supply and demand. It will send many thousands of the sons and daughters of sturdy Minnesota and Dakota pioneers to live and make their homes in the Province of British Columbia. I make the prediction, and I fearfully expect its fulfillment, that with the return of American prosperity Canadian shingles will flood the American market, asking and obtaining prices at a level which will be all the market will bear. [Applause].

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, awhile ago my valued friend from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] criticized individuals for "denouncing," as he said, this bill. It is rather significant that since he took his seat there has been denunciation of the bill by two Members of the majority, based upon the theory that certain rates are unduly low.

Personally I am not inclined to indulge in denunciation. I rather accept the view of some one who has said that the adjective and the adverb are the natural enemies of the noun, and that one had best ordinarily content himself with the use of the noun. What is the outstanding fact as to the denunciation of this measure? The fact is that no legislation offered in this Congress, no legislation offered in the last Congress—and each Congress has been under Republican control—has been the subject of more severe denunciation by those who are supposed to express the responsible opinion of the Republican Party than this bill. It has not been confined to any group or class of Republicans. The bill has been denounced by men who are in very high position, some of them in this Capitol, and some who recently have gone before the people of their States on the tariff along with other issues. For instance, as it passed the Senate it was denounced by the statesman who, perhaps, stands more completely and vigorously for the rights of the people than any other Republican—Senator BORAH, of Idaho.

Just the other day another Republican Senator submitted himself to the vote of a primary in a Republican State, and he proclaimed to the people of that State that the bill as it passed the Senate was "the greatest robber tariff ever attempted," and that view was indorsed by a majority for him of something like 170,000, I believe.

And will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] and his colleagues tell me what was the view as to the pending legislation expressed in that State in the primary contest by the gentleman who not long ago secured the Republican nomination for the United States Senate?

Consult the press of the country. Such representative papers as the New York Tribune, the New York Herald, the Springfield Republican, and a host of the greatest and most trusted Republican journals are so severe in their denunciation that Republicans are actually led to make the mean and unworthy charge that they are purchased by the advertising patronage which is given to them.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is very inapt in his quotations. The Springfield Republican, while Republican in name, is well known to be a Democratic paper.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I have known the Springfield Republican since youth. It is not a Democratic paper. It may be inaccurate to call it a Republican newspaper, but it is a leading and most influential independent paper.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. It has always been a free-trade paper.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If you will run through the debate in the Senate you may read the long roll of Republican newspapers that are against this measure, and of Republican leaders outside of Congress who are against it. I will venture to say that no party has ever brought forward a tariff bill that has been so sweepingly and severely reprobated by respectable and numerous members and organs of the party that has presented it. That being the case, there can be little doubt as to why it is now being pressed. The exigencies of a political campaign, exigencies of a peculiar character, call for its enactment.

When the bill was here before attention was drawn to the fact that Representatives were given no opportunity to present amendments. That was true. There is no opportunity now, of course, to propose amendments, and no opportunity for deliberate discussion.

I said when the bill was being originally considered, and gentlemen have said since at the other end of the Capitol, that the law under which the Tariff Commission acts should be so amended as at least to give that commission the power to recommend rates to Congress. Gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee who were then interrogated on that point said that would not do. Yet, forsooth, now we have something most extraordinary instead of the adoption of that reasonable proposal. It is now proposed that Congress shall turn over a large measure of its legislative authority to the Executive, a proposal unheard of up to this time; that Congress, charged with a definite duty and nearly always in session, shall abdicate its functions by vesting in the President the power to do this and that.

To raise and lower rates, to modify the basis of valuation, which can not be done without affecting the industries of the country most materially; which can not be done without determining what burdens shall be borne and how they shall be shifted from time to time. What would the fathers have said of that? How must that be regarded by any thoughtful man who considers the matter altogether aside from partisanship? The gentleman from Chicago [Mr. MADDEN] interrogated the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] when the latter was speaking upon that point, and wished to know what is extraordinary and subject to criticism in the provisions of the bill to which I am now alluding. What would my friend, Mr. MADDEN, who is chairman of the Appropriations Committee, say if we were to insert a provision in the appropriation bills that are dealt with here authorizing the President to raise or lower to the extent of 50 per cent the appropriations that are authorized by Congress? That would not be more indefensible than what is now proposed. Who has the time to discuss the constitutional question which has been raised? Elsewhere that question has been discussed with great ability; but leaving out of view any constitutional difficulty the proposed delegation of power is to be inconsistent with the fundamental principles of the Government and will weaken and undermine its foundations. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARNER. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia two more minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. This bill is being hurried through at a time when the country suffers from an excess of legislation in certain directions. Let me say to the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] that I do not believe there is going to be any great feeling of elation when this tariff bill as it is now framed is passed, but that, on the contrary, I believe there would be such a feeling if this Sixty-seventh Congress should enter upon a legislative vacation until the 4th of next March. [Applause.] If for the time being the tariff could be forgoten and the bonus and the ship subsidy postponed until a new Congress comes in—whether it be a Republican Congress or a Democratic Congress—if the Sixty-seventh Congress could extinguish itself in that way, there is little doubt that the country would engage in one of the most joyful funereal celebrations that has ever occurred. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. It did that in 1920. It is too early to begin again.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It will not be done because, unfortunately, there is always just ahead an election, as there is now, and that is the fact upon which our conduct here is too largely pivoted. If we had the courage, as well as the wisdom, to be less concerned about party politics and party lines and about our individual fate, it would be better for the country and it would be more distinctly to our own credit. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON]. [Applause.]

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, we are all weary of the debate on the tariff, and I am stimulated to speak only because we are about to become the victims of an infamous legislative swindle. I am referring to the dye embargo. Here is the situation: During the consideration of the tariff bill by the House the proposition to continue the embargo on dyestuffs was defeated by a decisive vote.

When an attempt was made in the Senate to amend the House bill by including such an embargo the Senate frustrated the attempt.

When the bill went to conference it contained no provision for an embargo.

The House had repudiated it, the Senate had repudiated it. Through some legerdemain, through some trickery, through some scheming, through some quibbling of those petty legal minds that the average man so despises the conferees bring it in here, the Speaker declares it to be within the rules of the House, and is sustained by a very close vote. I suppose a couple of Republicans whose consciences were sensitive were hiding somewhere in the lobby, and by the close vote of 150 to 147 the Speaker was sustained. You have the spectacle of six members of the conference committee defeating the will both of the House and of the Senate by putting back the embargo feature, and the House is helpless and powerless, bound by its own rules. The parliamentary practice of the House, Mr. Speaker, is a combination of chaos and rigor mortis. Once in a while you seem to be able to do everything. Most of the time you can do nothing at all. You can not move in any direction, and the Republicans are in that sad situation now. They are compelled to vote against the entire conference report if they wish to defeat this embargo business. The only way they can do it is by voting against the whole conference report, and they will not have the courage to do that. A Republican Member is not supposed to have more wisdom than his entire party, and if his entire party is stupid it is his inalienable right and his imperative duty to be likewise. [Laughter.] That seems to be an unquestionable and well recognized principle of American politics, of organization politics, of machine politics, of machine wisdom. Instead of the human brain—the great power given us to think, to study, to understand—we have substituted the collective wisdom, which in most cases means stupidity or somebody's selfish will or a complete lack of thought. This is substituted for individual reason, and the lack of conscience, which is so characteristic of an organization, is substituted for the live conscience of the individual.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Does my colleague believe in individualism?

Mr. LONDON. I believe in the individual brain and in the individual heart. I do not want to surrender either my brain or my liberty to think and vote according to my thought and my conscience to any organization in the world. An organization is valuable only when it represents the sum of the thoughts of the individual brains; but when you are a mere part of a machine, when you merely take orders, when a little clique of 6 men in the conference committee can defeat the will of 435 Members of the House and of 96 Members of the Senate you have reached a state of servility and of helplessness which makes of you a zero without a circumference. [Laughter.]

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Does not the Socialist Party denounce individualism?

Mr. LONDON. The gentleman is misinformed. I can not go into that. I have just one minute left. Socialism seeks to preserve the highest degree of individuality by giving to every man the opportunity to live as a free man, to earn his livelihood so that he may develop his intellect and grow into a strong man physically, mentally, and spiritually.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Through action by the state to the destruction of individuals?

Mr. LONDON. No; through action by the people. It is state action that you have here now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARNER. I yield to the gentleman another minute.

Mr. LONDON. You have taken me away from my subject. I want to tell you that I am in distress because I can not find parliamentary language in which to express what I want to say about this situation. If I were a plainer man, and if this were not a parliamentary body, I would have something to say about a bunch of crooks. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Texas inform us how many more speeches he has on his side?

Mr. GARNER. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO] such time as he desires.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, I had very definite views on the tariff question when I was elected to Congress 10 years ago, and my experience here with tariff legislation has confirmed those views and convinced me that I am right. Time is proving that the tariff is an economic and not a partisan question.

When we go to the customhouse to collect a tariff it is an advantage to the American producer over his foreign competitor, and this advantage should be distributed equally among the people deriving this benefit. For instance, it is nothing but fair that the farmers of our country receive protection on their agricultural products in proportion to the protection given to the manufacturers on their products. By what rule of fair play and sound reasoning can anyone expect those producing agricultural products to sell their products on a free market and buy what they need on a protected market?

Believing as I do that the tariff is an economic and not a partisan question, I would have our Tariff Commission composed in a nonsectional and nonpartisan way and committed to the principle of reasonable protection. What I mean by reasonable protection is not protection to enrich the few at the expense of the many but just enough to make good the difference between the cost of production in foreign countries where land and labor are cheap and the standard of living is low, and in the United States where land and labor are high and the standard of living is high. I would have this commission constantly at work gathering information and facts and conditions of commerce and industry, and then report to Congress from time to time so that we could adhere to a sound policy and enact just tariff rates.

There is a general awakening throughout the agricultural section of the United States on the importance of revising our tariff laws and establishing better treaty relations with foreign countries affecting commerce and trade. The last war has demonstrated to all the necessity of our country having its own vital industries at home and of not depending on foreign countries in time of emergency. The only way to have our industries going at home in time of emergency is to protect and develop them in time of peace. I am sure the southern Members will remember the enormous loss to the cotton farmers of the South when the war broke out because the United States had no merchant marine to carry our surplus cotton to the markets of the world. Then, too, we must not be fooled by the propaganda being spread throughout the country to-day trying to create the impression that if we permit, for instance, free rice or free sugar to come into this country the consumers would get the benefit of it. What would happen would be that our rice industry and our sugar industry would be absolutely destroyed by Asiatic rice and Cuban sugar, and then the importers would have a monopoly of these products, and having destroyed competition in the United States they would sell these products to the consumer much higher than they are paying now.

Another thought that should be impressed upon our people is that they should expect their Representatives to consider tariff legislation from a national and not a sectional standpoint. In other words, when I ask for reasonable protection for the products of my district and State—say, rice, sugar, cottonseed oil, long staple, and wool—it is nothing but fair that we should be willing to accord to the people engaged in other industries in other sections of our country the same reasonable protection.

While we wish to be fair and just and liberal with the other nations of the world, our duty as legislators is to look after the interests of America first. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield 17 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, it may seem presumptuous on my part to refer to what happened in the conference committee, or reasons that may have induced the conferees to vote as they did, because my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER] this morning announced his knowledge of every procedure that took place in the conference and the reasons and motives that actuated the conferees in their every action. I have suspected that some things leaked out from that conference committee room. I do not know, but it would seem from what the gentleman from Texas has said that his ear was not very far from the keyhole. But that is not at all surprising, because I once heard, and it happened in his district between the time when the gentleman from Texas voted for the emergency tariff bill and the time that he voted against it [laughter], that on one cold morning my friend from Texas was discovered with both ears frozen to the ground. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas made one positive and definite assertion with regard to this bill which I first desire to comment upon. He asserted that it is the highest tariff bill ever written. Very briefly I want to run through the various schedules of this bill and show that far from being the highest it is the lowest tariff bill that has ever been reported to Congress within my recollection when the Republican Party was in control. For instance, in Schedule 1, the chemical schedule, outside only of the organic products of chemistry, including coal-tar products, the duties in general, almost without exception, are lower than they were in the Payne and Dingley laws. That is true also, with a few exceptions, in the earthenware schedule. That is abundantly true of the metal schedule. The duties on basic iron and steel and most metallic substances are lower in this bill than they have been before in a Republican tariff bill. In the wood schedule, for the first time in the history of a Republican tariff measure, all lumber of every sort or kind is on the free list.

The one schedule in which the duty is raised is Schedule 5—the sugar schedule. That is higher than it has ever been before. I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] referred to the duties now levied by Great Britain. Let me point out the fact that Great Britain, which has been cited by gentlemen on the other side of the aisle as having the ideal tariff system, puts a duty of more than two and a half times as high on sugar as that provided in this bill.

The tobacco schedule is about the same. Tobacco is a luxury, and I do not think any gentleman objects to a high duty on tobacco. The one exception outside of the sugar schedule to the general rule of lower duties in this bill are some products in the agricultural schedule. The duty on agricultural products—cattle, meat, milk and cream, and things of that sort—are higher in this bill than ever before.

The farmer has had a good deal more of a share in the making of this bill than he ever had before in the history of the country. [Applause.] The gentleman from Alabama, with tears streaming down his cheeks, referred to the terrible treatment the farmer has had by putting one item which he uses in the cultivation of his product on the dutiable list—that is, potash. He neglected to inform you that he is opposed to placing any duty whatever on anything that the farmer produces. That is typical of the difference between that side of the House and this side of the House.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman will not say that he is responsible for the agricultural schedule.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No. The gentleman does not say that. The gentleman is not commenting upon what certain individuals did or may not have done within the sacred precincts of the conference room. The duty on spirits is about the same as under the Payne law, but that is the most inoperative schedule in this bill. [Laughter.] The duty on cotton is lower throughout the bill, I think I am safe in saying, than it has ever been in any Republican tariff measure. The duty on flax, hemp, and jute products—I think I am safe in saying, and I appeal to my friend from Iowa—is lower than it ever has been on linen goods in any Republican tariff measure.

I come now to the duty on wool, and I say to you, gentlemen, that the duty on wool is very substantially lower than it was in the Payne bill and immensely lower than under the existing law. And yet gentlemen talk about the great increase in the cost of clothing by virtue of the passage of this bill. Take the duty on scoured wool, which is the basis of clothing and everything that every man wears; it is 14 cents a pound less than under the law that exists to-day.

The duty on silks is perhaps a trifle higher in some cases than it was under the Payne law. But is silk a necessity; is silk used by farmers, by the plain people in the country? It seems to me the duty on silk and the products of silk is well justified, and certainly the Government needs the revenue. The duty on paper is very much lower than it ever has been in a Republican tariff measure, and print paper and wood pulp are on the free list. The last schedule, that of sundries, which covers everything that we do not provide for in other schedules, generally speaking, is very much lower than ever before in a Republican tariff bill.

For instance, hides are now on the free list; not only hides but for the first time in the history all the products of hides—leather, harness, and shoes even—are on the free list. Why, the gentleman from Texas justifies absolutely the statement he made in closing, that he knew nothing whatever about this bill. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Now I desire to make comment on one or two outstanding matters, and I only do it because the question was brought up this morning on the merits of the proposition, the merits of which were not properly under discussion of the so-called dye embargo. It was asserted, in the first place, that there was a dye monopoly in this country, and, in the second place, that the present law dealing with manufacturers of synthetic organic chemicals was an embargo. I hold in my hand a statement signed by a very large number—I have not paused to count them—of manufacturers of dyes, coming from almost every State in the country, in which the statement is made that there is absolutely no monopoly in this industry.

That statement is as follows:

The charge that a monopoly exists in the American dye and organic chemical industry is so completely at variance with the actual facts that whenever it has been made in the past it has been fully refuted.

Repetition of this charge at this time can be inspired only by a source seeking to harm the American synthetic organic chemical industry. It has been clearly shown that there is no monopoly in the American industry; that there exists, on the contrary, very keen competition. In view of this we are forced to the conclusion that those who now repeat this charge act without knowledge of the true conditions in this industry.

We, the undersigned independent manufacturers of drugs, dyes, and other organic chemicals, believe that every person cognizant of the truth is fully aware that there is no hint of monopolistic control of this industry. But, in order that there may be no possibility of misunderstanding at this time, we repeat that we are independent American manufacturers, and that there does not exist a monopoly of this industry.

We are anxious that the repetition and republication of this charge now should not again create a confusion of mind which might jeopardize legislation now before Congress in respect to this American industry.

The exhaustive investigation of the American dye and organic chemical industry conducted by a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate (known as Senate Resolution 77) should prove conclusively the complete falsity of the charge that a monopoly controls this industry. The investigation extended over a period of three and a half months, and testimony taken comprises a volume of 1,477 printed octavo pages. The entire industry has placed itself without reservation at the command of the committee. The result of this investigation should once and for all set at rest this unfounded and false charge.

Senator SHORTRIDGE, of California, chairman of the investigating committee, in a speech in the Senate on July 15, said:

"I wish to advise Senators, now, that there was not one witness—not one—who testified that there was or is anything approximating a monopoly in this industry; upon the contrary each and every witness, though differing it may be upon other matters, testified that there was active and, as they termed it, 'cut-throat' competition."

Senator STERLING, the other member of this investigating committee, on the floor of the Senate on August 18, last, stated:

"I have the honor of being a member of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee which investigated the dye industry. I was unable to hear all the testimony, very much of it I could not hear because of other pressing duties, but that which I did hear convinced me that there was no combination whatsoever among the various dye industries in this country. Indeed, the witness most relied upon by those who were asserting that there was a combination or monopoly admitted that there was the sharpest competition between the various companies engaged in the production of chemicals and dyes."

In solemn earnestness we repeat that no monopoly has or does control this vitally important American industry, which is made up literally of hundreds of small and large, entirely independent and competing concerns. It is unthinkable that an unsubstantiated charge of this character should furnish the means of defeating the continuity of the industry. We ask solely that we be judged by the facts and receive protection accordingly.

We know of only one monopoly, and that is the German dye and chemical cartel, whose agents and propagandists are using every available effort to create misunderstanding in order to prevent the enactment of legislation which would fully preserve and develop our own American dye and organic chemical industry.

Respectfully submitted.

In other words, under existing law these dyes, which are not produced in this country and are demanded by the consumers of dyes, are coming into the country freely in very large quantities, and they will continue to do so if we pass this bill just as it is.

Now, gentlemen, to my mind it would be an extremely foolish thing for anyone, no matter how dissatisfied he may be with certain items in this bill, which consists of thousands of different items, to oppose the entire bill because of such dissatisfaction. Another body has delayed the passage of this bill for more than a year, and without casting any reflection whatever upon that very distinguished body at the other end of the Capitol, I think it was rather characteristic of the speed with which that body functions, that only yesterday a bill came over providing for the getting rid of snow and ice on the streets of Washington accumulated last winter. [Laughter and applause.]

Send this bill back to conference, bring these eminent statesmen back again into conference, and is anyone sure that there will be any tariff bill this month or next month? Gentlemen, the only way to get along in this country where there is a conflict of interests, of all kinds of conflicting geographical conditions, is to harmonize differences if we are to have tariff legislation based on no matter what principle. We have to give and take, and because any man is dissatisfied because there is something in the bill which he does not want or wants something in the bill which is not in it, shall he take the recourse of recommitting the entire bill? If so, the snows may fly before we ever have any tariff bill at all. I ask you, my colleagues, to think well before you accept the leadership of the gentleman from Texas, whose only desire—and I do not blame him for it, because it is good politics from his point of view—is to create disruption upon this side of the House and prevent, if he can, the passage of a Republican protective tariff measure. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] has 21 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has 18 minutes remaining.

[Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. We can not vote at this time. We want a larger number of Republicans to be here.

Mr. GARNER. I want to accommodate the Republican side.

Mr. Speaker, while I had the privilege of the floor earlier in the day I called attention to the fact that Republicans throughout the campaign from now until the November elections, about 90 per cent of them, would be trying to convince the people of this country that this was a low protective tariff measure; that they would be apologizing for the high rates and telling their constituents that the provision allowing the President to lower the rates would be put into execution at the earliest possible moment. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has confirmed me in that belief in the remarks which he has just made. The gentleman from Ohio, if he had his way, would write these rates lower than they are now in most cases. He believes that the rates in this bill, outside of the chemical schedule, are too high. He will be telling the people in Ohio between now and election that it is his firm belief, and that of his associates who have access to the White House, that the President will be reducing these rates very soon under the unusual powers given him in this bill.

I was very much amused at the appeal of the gentleman from Ohio to the Republicans, to the effect that if they wanted a tariff bill they must not trust the Senate to get it. But I call the gentleman's attention to one fact—that the motion which I shall make to the House, a motion to recommit the bill to the conferees, will be an instruction to agree to Senate amendments. Now I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio how the Senate could refuse to permit the House to agree to their action? They put potash on the free list. I am going to insist that we agree to that amendment and adopt the Senate policy. I think it is the right policy to adopt and that a duty on potash would be an outrage to the agricultural interests of the country.

The Senate also repealed article 5 of the emergency tariff act, known as the dye embargo. I am going to insist that we accept the Senate amendment. If a majority of the House Members vote to recommit this bill and the House conferees go back and carry out the instructions, we will have the bill back in 10 minutes, not in 10 hours, because the country would not tolerate for a single minute the Senate conferees publicly repudiating their own action; they would not tolerate their doing it openly before the country. I repeat, the Senate placed potash on the free list, and they specifically repealed article 5 of the emergency tariff. My motion to recommit will instruct the House conferees to accept the Senate amendments in both cases. Can you imagine the bill would be tied up indefinitely? Nobody with any judgment would think that. I am certain that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] knows better. The gentleman from Ohio has a very poor opinion of the Senate if he thinks they can afford even to stand out against public opinion and repudiate the action of their own body.

Just one remark about the emergency tariff. It has been a soft morsel under the tongue of the gentleman from Ohio, who has seen fit to lash me for the last year on account of the fact that I voted for the emergency tariff bill when first passed, limited to six months' duration. I voted for it then. If I had it to do over again, with the same facts before me, I would vote for it again. I believed then that in many instances we ought to pass emergency measures, as we did pass them, but when it came to putting this law on the statute books as a permanent law I refused.

The emergency tariff act was passed for the benefit of the agricultural people, and the sole benefit derived from it—and I challenge the denial of this statement, and I challenge the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], coming from an agricultural country, to contradict it—the sole benefit that the American people got out of this emergency tariff was out of wool. The wool industry was the only industry that profited by that measure from a protective standpoint. They have profited by it up to this hour, but not a single other industry has gained by the emergency tariff. I opposed its being put on the statute books as a permanent policy. So, once for all, let the gentleman from Ohio understand that when he tries to put me in the attitude of voting for an emergency law and putting it permanently on the statute books, I repudiate his suggestion.

I want to say, gentlemen, in conclusion, that I respect the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] as well as the gentleman from Ohio. I think they have done the best they could with a bad job. But, as I said earlier in the day, they had this condition to deal with, where the demand of one Senator was sufficient to make them yield in order to get a tariff bill. That statement is in accordance with the appeal that the gentleman from Ohio has just addressed to you, that although you want to recommit this bill, although you feel that the provision sheltering the dye monopoly ought to be out of it, and although you feel that there ought not to be a duty on potash, yet he appeals to your party loyalty, and says in his appeal that if you do not vote for it it will be only a little time before the Senate will declare that there will be no tariff bill at all, because the Senate will repudiate its own action. Gentlemen, I appeal to you to do what is right and help us kill this dye-embargo provision and the duty on potash. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa has 21 minutes to his credit.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, we entered upon the construction of this tariff bill under the most unsettled conditions. It was undoubtedly the hardest time that has ever been known in which to frame a tariff bill. But I shall present no excuses for the bill on that ground. I want at this time, in the first place, to congratulate the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], both of whom indulged in much denunciation and little argument, on the fact that they at least did not use the stock lies that have been published in the newspapers and used upon the platform with reference to this bill. They are too high-minded gentlemen to indulge in anything of that kind. Yet it is a positive relief to us upon the Republican side to hear some talk about this bill from Democratic sources that does not contain some absolute falsity with reference to what the bill contains. Never has there been spread such a propaganda of misrepresentation, mendacity, and falsehood in the press and on the platform as there has been with reference to this bill. On occasions when previous protective tariff bills were before the country I thought that their opponents had exhausted all the epithets that could be used. The expressions "robber tariff" and "robber barons" were common when the McKinley, the Dingley, and the Payne bills were up and the air was filled with denunciations of those bills, but on this occasion those who are opposed to the policy of protection have surpassed themselves in defamation.

In this connection I wish to say a few words with reference to the cry that the tariff is going to increase the cost of living. The best way to determine what is going to occur in the future is from the experience of the past. I challenge gentlemen on the other side to show any Republican tariff bill that in the course of its operation has appreciably raised the general cost of living. I see that no one accepts the challenge. They can not make this showing. Everyone within the sound of my voice and everyone who may read this speech knows that that was not the effect of the Payne bill or the Dingley bill. The records show that during the time these bills were in force there was, instead, a gradual reduction of prices; but, to the honor and credit of the Republican Party, there was a continuous advance in wages. The Republican tariff bills, embodying as they do the protective principle, have always produced that result. They have not increased the general level of prices. They have merely placed the American market under the control of the American manufacturer and the American producer. With the American market in their control and under Republican policies, the effect has been to reduce prices and increase wages.

Mr. Speaker, this propaganda of falsehoods which has been so industriously spread by the importers, who, as I shall show further on, have been making immense profits at the expense of the American people, is simply the old, old story. After the McKinley bill had been enacted, which for the first time put a tariff on tin plate, men were sent all over McKinley's district with articles of tinware, urging the people to buy quickly, as the prices would go up as soon as the bill commenced to operate. The result was to defeat McKinley in the congressional election, but the people soon found how false these statements were with reference to a rise in prices produced by a protective tariff bill, and McKinley was triumphantly elected President at the next election. Now tin articles are sold cheaper here than abroad, and we are exporting tin plate in large quantities. That, Mr. Speaker, was 25 years or more ago, and those starting this campaign of falsehood think the people have forgotten it, so they have started the old "tin-cup campaign" again.

The tariff bill has been before Congress for about 18 months. There never has been so much time and work put upon a tariff bill and none has ever been prepared with such care. The managers on the part of the House, after a conference of about three weeks with those of the Senate, have come to you with a bill for which we have every reason to ask not only the support of the House but the country at large.

It is, of course, a bill which is based upon protective principles and drawn upon protective lines, but it is a bill in which no concealed protection can be found and as to which no claim can be made that in its provisions there is concealed some hidden "joker." It is so written that anyone, upon reading, can determine its rates and the amount of protection which it affords.

In beginning I alluded to the fact that the country had been flooded with propaganda against the bill, much of which was pure falsehood. A stock lie with reference to the bill is that it is the highest tariff bill ever brought before Congress. This statement is absolutely false and it is easy for you to make the figures which show its falsity. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, our total imports for consumption were $2,547,797,024, or about $2,500,000,000 in round figures. The duties collected were, in round figures, $356,000,000. It is estimated that this bill will produce $50,000,000 additional in revenue, or $406,000,000. This, upon the basis of the imports of the last fiscal year, would make the average duty a little less than 16 per cent. Compared with previous protective tariff bills we find that the Dingley bill from 1901 to 1908 averaged 25.45 per cent. The Payne bill from 1909 to 1913 averaged 20.61 per cent. Thus we have demonstrated what the advocates of protection have always contended—that by protecting an industry in this country until it became established we could gradually lower the duties and in many instances put the articles heretofore protected on the free list.

Wild statements have been made as to what this bill would cost the American people. A glance at the figures above will show what the fact is. If the American consumer paid all of this increase of rates, and we Republicans claim that the foreigner will pay the greater part of it—if, as I said, the consumer paid all of this increase of $50,000,000 in duties, it would only cost the American people about 45 cents per capita in a year, an insignificant amount to pay for the protection of our American industries. Under this bill over half of our imports will pay no duty whatever. We present to you a bill that is lower, much lower, than any protective tariff bill ever before brought before Congress.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Do I understand the principal argument in support of this bill to be made by the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Iowa is that it fixes lower rates than the Payne bill fixed?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not the principal argument. I was merely stating a fact that no tariff expert will deny. We have demonstrated the truth of the Republican doctrine that by giving protection to industry in the first instance we in the long run enable the article to be sold to the consumer at a cheaper rate, maintain the wages of our workers, and enable them to preserve the American scale of living. [Applause.]

Let us now turn to the provisions of the bill and see what it actually contains, instead of taking the statement of some one who does not know what is in it or who willfully perverts its provisions.

In the first place, as I have before stated, we have greatly enlarged the free list of any other protective tariff bill. Those who have had occasion to pay the present high prices demanded for building material will be pleased to learn that logs, boards, clapboards, lath, shingles, in fact lumber of all kinds, are admitted free. Brick and cement are also admitted free, unless the country from which they are exported imposes a duty on the same material when imported from our country. All of these articles were dutiable under the Payne bill and previous protective bills.

Agricultural implements, together with hand cream separators and barbed wire, are put upon the free list, all of which were dutiable under the Payne bill. Carpet wool when used for carpets or floor coverings is also on the free list. Wood pulp and newsprint paper are on the free list where the country from which it is imported does not impose a duty on our wood pulp, and I know of none which does. Both were dutiable under the Payne law. Hides, of which we are obliged to import about one-half of our supply, are on the free list, but the farmer gets in return free leather, free boots and shoes, and free work harness. All of these items were dutiable under the Payne bill. Coal is also on the free list, though soft coal was dutiable under the Payne bill. I shall also call your attention, as I proceed, to other articles that were dutiable under the Payne bill but are now on the free list.

Passing over the chemical and earthenware schedules, I shall begin with schedule 3, metals and manufactures of, in which iron ore has been put on the free list and the duty on pig iron reduced from $2.50 a ton in the Payne bill to 75 cents a ton. In general the duties in this schedule are reduced from those of the Payne bill, although the duties have been increased on manganese, tungsten, and alloys thereof. It was found that the rate of exchange with Germany, which at the time of making the bill was about 300 marks for a dollar and is now even less, operated so much in favor of Germany that high rates were necessary to protect the cutlery industry.

While these rates are very high, and higher than any previous rates, I do not believe that they are high enough to enable the industry to maintain itself against German competition. The testimony before the Senate committee showed on actual importations that pocketknives were being brought in from Germany at a cost of from 5 cents to 20 cents each and sold here at from $1 to $3 each. One specially fine knife with ornamental handles and scissor blades was shown to have been imported at 58 cents and sold at $8.40. With scissors and razors it was the same. The actual production cost in Germany, where the best skilled mechanic gets only about 30 cents a day in our money, is not to exceed 20 per cent of what it would cost to produce these same articles in this country. But they will not cost the consumer any more under this tariff. The testimony showed that there was a margin of anywhere from 400 per cent to 2,000 per cent profit between the landed cost duty paid and the retail price of these articles. The importer will simply have to be contented with more modest demands, say 50 per cent or 100 per cent profit, but the reason of their opposition to the bill is found in the extortionate profits that they are making.

The wood schedule needs no mention beyond the additions therein to the free list which have already been specified.

When we come to the sugar schedule we find as a part of this same propaganda that stories have been circulated about the enormous increase in the tariff on sugar. Let us see what the facts are. We get all of our imported sugar from Cuba, as Cuba has, under the reciprocity treaty, a preferential reduction of 20 per cent from what is called the full-duty rate. It is true that we increased the full-duty rate from 2 cents to 2.20 cents per pound or one-fifth of a cent a pound, but it is unnecessary to consider this, as it is only the rate on Cuban sugar that figures at all in this connection. The present rate established by the emergency tariff a year and a half ago is 1.60 cents a pound on Cuban sugar. We have increased that rate to 1.76 cents a pound—sixteen one-hundredths of a cent a pound. The increase is less than one-sixth of a cent a pound. The consumption of sugar per capita in the United States, for all purposes—candy, bakers' use, and everything—is about 80 pounds per capita. For household or family use it is about 40 pounds per capita. If the American consumer paid the whole of this increase the total additional expense for a family of four persons would be about 25 cents a year. But the American consumer does not pay this duty. It is paid by the foreigner and the sugar refiners, otherwise known as the Sugar Trust. A table of prices on sugar for each month for more than 20 years was placed in the records of the Senate.

It showed that the tariff has practically nothing to do with the price of sugar; that when we reduced the duty on Cuban sugar 20 per cent sugar went up instead of going down; that when the Underwood bill reduced rates on sugar the price of sugar to American consumers was not lowered, and all of us know that when the emergency tariff was put on sugar a year ago last May prices, instead of rising, as gentlemen on the other side said they would, slowly fell for the next nine months. The beet-sugar factories of this country have saved the American consumer millions of dollars, for when the beet sugar comes on the market the price of sugar always falls and grocerymen have generally learned to lay in their stocks of sugar at that time, knowing that when the beet sugar is exhausted the price will rise again. The Cubans insist that they pay all of the duty on sugar, and they are very much disturbed about it. As a matter of fact, they do pay the most of it, but when we reduce the rate the oft-indicted Sugar Trust increases its refining margin to absorb it, and when we increase the rate it is usually obliged to decrease the refining margin on the raw sugar imported from Cuba. Sugar can be produced in Cuba as low as 1½ cents a pound for raw sugar. No American factory can compete with it. No man would claim that the consumer will pay any more for candy or confectionery on account of the increase we have made in the duty, and in the long run the consumer will greatly benefit from it.

Passing over the tobacco schedule, the next is that which includes agricultural products and provisions.

For the first time in our history the farmer has received in this bill his share of protection against imported agricultural products. The emergency tariff enacted by this Congress, and which became a law May 27, 1921, imposed additional duties on agricultural products. I shall refer to its beneficial effects on the whole country further on. For the present I shall only say it saved from financial ruin millions of farmers and stockmen without costing the consumer an additional cent, although, as one of its results, wheat went up for a time 21 cents higher in Minneapolis than in Winnipeg and has remained about 10 cents higher. Neither flour nor bread has ever cost a consumer 10 cents a year more by reason thereof. The rates on agricultural products have been somewhat raised in this bill from those of the emergency tariff. These slight increases will no more affect the price to the consumer than did the greater raise made by the emergency tariff, and if they did I shall show later how immensely beneficial to the whole country was the support given our agricultural interests by the emergency tariff bill, and this bill will have the same result.

Schedule 8, spirits, wines, and other beverages, has become of little importance, and I shall take no time upon it.

The cotton schedule was the source of much criticism in the Payne bill. Some of its provisions in that act were characterized as "jokers," containing concealed protection. There is nothing of the kind in this bill. Notwithstanding the great raise in the wages of employees in the cotton mills over those prevailing at the time of the Payne bill, we have much reduced the rates in this measure below those provided in the Payne bill or any other protective measure. A comparatively high duty is placed upon suèded cotton gloves of not less than 40 per cent nor more than 65 per cent ad valorem, depending upon the length of the glove. These are ladies' dress gloves. The industry is a new one in this country, which sprang up during the war, and for a few years must have a comparatively high duty in order to exist. In this connection I might note that the duties on men's cotton working gloves are lower than those of the Underwood Democratic bill; and if I had time I might cite many other similar instances in the bill.

Of the flax schedule it is sufficient to say that as a whole it is lower than that of the Payne bill, and while complaint is made of the tariff on linen napkins and tablecloths they are not enough higher than the Underwood rates to cause any appreciable rise in prices. Here again the importers have been reaping a great profit, the official import entries of the Treasury showing that napkins had been imported from Germany at 6.9 cents, the cost landed in the United States being 11.7 cents, but that they were sold at retail at 45.8 cents each, the percentage of profit of retail prices over landed costs being 313 per cent.

The wool schedule of the Payne bill was a storm center and some of its provisions were rightfully criticized as giving the manufacturer undue protection and giving the farmer too little. The rates on wool in the Payne bill were nominally 11 cents in the grease, 22 cents washed, and 33 cents scoured. Actually, through a provision with reference to skirted wool, which was commonly called a "joker," the real protection which the American farmer got upon his fine wool was only about 18 cents or 20 cents on the scoured pound. Under this provision wool was imported in the grease "skirted"; that is, the heavy and dirty parts removed, so that it shrunk about 25 per cent less than it would if imported in the natural state. Notwithstanding this provision the protection to the manufacturer was based on the theory that it would take 4 pounds of wool in the grease to make a pound of cloth, and the compensatory basis to the manufacturer was fixed in the Payne bill at 44 cents per pound. The Underwood bill, of course, put all wool on the free list. The emergency bill put a rate of 15 cents a pound on wool in the grease, 30 cents washed, and 45 cents scoured, and eliminated the "joker" which was in the Payne bill. The emergency tariff rates now in force on wool are higher than the rates carried by this bill because there is no possible way of evading the emergency duties by skirting. Anyone that asserts the contrary is deliberately falsifying if he understands the wool situation.

In this bill we have put a duty of 31 cents a pound on the clean content of the wool, the price of wool always being estimated on its clean or scoured content, but for reasons not necessary to explain here, it is always imported in the grease. This rate is higher in effect than the Payne bill, but not higher than was intended by it, as the rate on scoured wool in the Payne bill was 33 cents, a duty which was evaded in the manner I have before explained. It is much lower than the rates of the emergency bill, which, as I have said, have been in force for a year and a half, as all of the experts of the Tariff Commission agree and as, in fact, anyone can see from a mere comparison of the rates. If any further proof or confirmation is needed, it is found in the undisputed fact that there are now lying in bond at the port of Boston nearly 100,000,000 pounds of wool waiting to come in under the lower rates of this bill.

The emergency tariff took wool from the free list and laid upon it a heavier duty than this bill carries. It also added 45 cents per pound to the duty on cloth. Yet the price of clothing has continuously declined ever since the emergency act was passed. One reason is that the cloth in a suit is such a small part of its cost, the main item being labor. The figures presented by the Tariff Commission show that it takes about 3½ yards to make a suit of clothes. Assuming this to be 12-ounce cloth, which is the average weight, there would be a little less than 4 pounds to a suit. If the consumer paid the whole of the tariff extra, and he does not on account of competition, the increase by reason of the tariff on wool carried by this bill would cost him less than $1.20 a suit. The American Woolen Co., which makes the greater amount of the cloth used in this country, anticipating the reduction in rates on wool, has offered its goods at a much less figure than last year. The London trade papers show that the English manufacturers expect to land their goods, tariff paid, also at lower figures. Any advance in the cost of clothing will be sheer profiteering.

But while we have raised the rates upon wool so that a higher duty will, in effect, be paid than under the Payne bill, we have given the manufacturer only the protection to which he is entitled, and consequently the duties on cloth, which are the final test to the consumer, are less in this bill than in the Payne bill—much less on the cheap and ordinary grades of cloth, somewhat less on the most expensive.

The Payne bill was also criticized because a compensatory duty was given if there was any wool whatever in the cloth or blanket manufactured. We have eliminated this and allowed compensation only when the component part of the chief value is wool. The rates on the cheaper cloths are greatly reduced from those in the Payne bill, but on all cloth they are reduced.

The rates on blankets are very much lower than those in the Payne bill, especially the cheaper ones. Carpet wool is put on the free list if not used for clothing. When so used it bears a special rate. There being no duty on carpet wools, which were dutiable under the Payne bill, the rates in this bill on carpets are very much lower than in the Payne bill.

Time will not permit a discussion of the other schedules. In the sundry schedule a higher duty is put upon expensive laces than that in the Payne bill. They are luxuries, and people who buy them can afford to pay the duty to the Government, even if the cost is thereby increased.

A very important provision in the administration provisions needs special consideration. For years it has been urged that the tariff should be taken out of politics and put upon a scientific basis. This is the first time in our legislative history that a tariff bill has a provision by which this theory may be carried out. The President, under the advice and findings of the Tariff Commission, may raise or lower the rates of the bill not to exceed 50 per cent or may put them upon the basis of an American valuation instead of the foreign valuation provided by the bill. This provision has been misunderstood by some, who imagine the President may at his own sweet will raise or lower the rates. He can do nothing of the kind. He can act only in accordance with the findings of fact made by the Tariff Commission between the difference of cost of production at home and abroad. If the rates in this bill are too high or too low, anyone can present his petition to the Tariff Commission and have their action thereon. I consider this one of the best provisions in the bill. The principle of protection has been so generally accepted by the American people that while some Republican Members of the House or Senate may vote against the bill because they do not like some particular rate or provision about an equal number of Democrats will vote for it because they realize the great benefits to the country at large.

It is a Democratic doctrine that the consumer pays the full duty on imported articles. We Republicans have always denied this. Competitive conditions brought about by a protective tariff have always compelled the foreigner to reduce his price and pay a part—and sometimes all—of the tariff. To-day on the Boston market there are certain kinds of coarse wool freely offered for sale at less than 15 cents a pound in the grease, although the tariff alone is 15 cents. I have already cited the instance of the reduction in the cost of tin plate brought about by the tariff which was placed on it. In that, as well as thousands of other articles, when the foreigner wants to enter our market he is obliged to pay the whole of the tariff.

Mr. Speaker, at the time the emergency tariff was enacted a long trail of disaster, resulting from Democratic mismanagement, had thrown 5,000,000 men out of employment according to the statistics of the Labor Department, had made agriculture absolutely prostrate, and brought ruin upon the sheep and cattle growers and failure to the banks that endeavored to carry them. Under the Underwood bill, in the year previous to the enactment of the emergency tariff, there was imported about 260,000,000 pounds of wool, over 150,000,000 pounds of frozen mutton and beef, nearly 60,000,000 bushels of wheat, and so much butter that the price of milk to the farmer was actually forced down below the price of concentrated dairy feed which was given to his cows. An immense amount of eggs and other agricultural products had been brought into the country. The result was that wool became unmarketable, sheep were sold in Chicago for little more than the freight, cattle were sold at ruinous prices, all to no benefit to the consumer. The benefits of this act, which once more gave buying power to the farmers, who constitute 40 per cent of all of the population of the country, have been reflected in every commercial and industrial channel. The steel production in June of this year was 25 per cent over the maximum production of 1912–13, department store sales were 30 per cent higher, ready-made clothing sales 35 per cent more, bank clearings were greatly increased, there were over 100,000 more freight cars in use than were operated the previous year, and, best of all, there is little unemployment except among those who are voluntarily out upon strikes. We now propose to extend the principles of this measure by this complete tariff bill, the necessity of which is apparent.

All persons who have traveled in continental Europe since the war agree that the people are wretchedly poor and that they are willing to sell much of their manufacturing products for almost any price they can get and all of it at prices much lower than ours. Mr. Samuel Untermyer, a very prominent Democratic lawyer of New York, has come back from a study of conditions in continental Europe a confirmed protectionist. In a public statement he says that the labor of continental Europe is "hopelessly pauperized," that their general cost of production is not more than 20 per cent of ours, and that it is "imperative that we protect our laboring classes against that sort of competition." What reasonable man will not agree with him when he says that "a prosperous people with ever increasing standards of living, such as we are happily attaining, can not exist against such impossible competition."

Mr. Speaker, this bill will maintain the American standard of living for the laborer, will give hope to the farmer, will set in motion the mills that are now idle through pauper competition, will give additional employment to capital and prosperity to the country at large. Such, Mr. Speaker, has always been the history of Republican protective measures.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, in three minutes I can not make much of a statement about potash, but I want to say to the gentlemen of the House that there is a gentleman by the name of Doctor Huston in the lobby now in the interest of Germany, and he is interviewing Members of the House on potash. The potash industry is a great industry which sprang up here during the war. At Still Lake, Calif., where there is a great branch of this industry which sprang up during the war, there is an almost unlimited supply of salt-water potash. In Colorado or Nebraska there is an almost unlimited supply of potash in water.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. In just a minute. Seventy-five thousand tons can be, and are being, produced annually in the cement factories of this country by the use of dust collectors, as the dust carries a very large percentage of potash. Twenty-five thousand tons are being produced annually by the sugar factories in this country, and 20,000 tons by the smelting furnaces of this country. The money invested in the potash industries of this country is principally in these Western States, and the question with you to-day is: Do you want to save a great industry that helped us during the war, that was developed because of the war, or do you want to turn the industry over to the gentleman who sits in the alcove now, Doctor Huston, who represents the Germans? In Germany they produce a million tons a year and have an estimate of 600 years' supply. Alsace-Lorraine, now controlled by the French, has almost an equal amount. The statement has been made that Germany and France have now entered into an agreement to divide the American territory between Germany and France. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

[Cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. By the agreement previously made the previous question is ordered.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARNER moves to recommit the conference report on the bill H. R. 7456 to the committee of conference with instructions to the House conferees to agree to the Senate amendments putting fertilizer potash on the free list and to strike out the provision containing the dye embargo.

Mr. GARNER. On that I move the previous question.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to recommit the bill to the committee of conference with instruction to the House conferees.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 177, nays 130, not voting 120, as follows:

YEAS—177.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. If gentlemen desire to make inquiry in regard to their votes, can not they do it from their seats?

The SPEAKER. They can, and that is the proper place.

Mr. GARNER. I only make that suggestion because I think the House is entitled to know just what is going on.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen desiring to inquire in regard to their votes will please take their seats.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Under general leave to print the extension of remarks on the tariff bill are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. BIXLER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I have listened attentively to the arguments advanced by both sides of the House on this tariff bill, and I must say it is my belief that many of them are inspired by selfish motives. I think we should discuss this tariff bill without any local prejudices or interests affecting our interest in the general prosperity of our Nation, and consequently the welfare of each and every individual who makes up a component part of it. A proper solution of the tariff now will enable us to meet the great problems in production and consumption that we know are now facing us.

The Republican Party is committed to a protective tariff, and it was so incorporated in their platform. I was elected on this platform and stand for those principles. Under normal times true prosperity was never with us unless we had this required protection for our industries, and we need it more now than we ever did in the past. We furnished the world with their needs during the war, and now we must compete with all other countries, not only abroad but right here at home.

After all, is not the object of a tariff bill a revenue raiser to help defray the expenses of maintaining this great Government? You hear arguments that nothing should bear a tariff on farm products or anything that pertains to agriculture. If this policy were to be followed by all other interests there would be no revenue from a tariff source.

I believe the American farmer is a protectionist. I believe he wants the American deposit of potash developed, and in that development I do not believe he expects labor to be paid starvation wages while in its devolopment state because he knows full well when the vast deposits are fully developed he will reap the benefits of the little advance he was compelled to pay for a short time. The farmer does not want to be at the mercy of the two countries who now own all the potash, and as these countries are money mad will combine to extort a fancy price from the American consumers of that commodity.

A tariff must be fairly distributed, and what does it matter if a certain commodity seems a trifle inequitable. Can not the producer or the manufacturer reflect the small difference in the product and the consumer will pay it as he always does? I believe this would be a less objectionable way of raising revenue than by personal income tax. Surely no one will seriously object to allowing the foreign countries help pay the burden of taxation upon our poor people by giving them the privilege to do business with 110,000,000 people by paying a small tax for these privileges.

Let us have a protective tariff equal to the difference between wages paid in America and in Europe. This is necessary to protect our American workmen against competition with the cheap labor of Europe. I have noticed somewhere this comparison. An ounce of gold will purchase only 17 hours of labor in the United States, but will buy 50 hours of labor in Great Britain, 96 hours in Japan, 117 hours in France, and 202 hours in Germany. With his day's wages the American can buy 21 pounds of beef, while the Englishman can purchase with his less than 10 pounds, the Frenchman less than 7, the Italian only 4, and the German less than 4. Another comparison of wages is shown by selecting the 12 largest cities in Germany and comparing the German official wage statistics of 1913 with those of December 31, 1921, the United States Tariff Commission finds an astonishing decrease in the weekly wage scale in a number of occupations. The figures, reduced to the American gold basis, are taken from the German official yearbook for 1915 giving wages in Germany for 1913, and from the publication of the General German Trade-Union Federation of March 4, 1922, showing the wages in force in December, 1921. A tabulation made from the commission's findings reads as follows:

Occupation.	Wages per week.
Bakers	$6.14	$2.52
Tailors	11.17	2.78
Brewery workers (skilled)	7.73	2.43
Brewery works (unskilled)	5.83	2.39
Painters	14.38	2.58
Stonecutters	17.41	2.56
Stonemasons	17.22	3.00
Bookbinders	6.69	2.59
Printers	7.71	2.74
Carpenters	13.00	2.59
Transportation workers	6.57	2.30

The Republican Party's system and policies of a protective tariff builds up a domestic industry and instead of increasing prices it always has a tendency to decrease them to the consumer. In protecting these industries and fostering new ones we benefit laborers, and this will greatly increase our purchasing power and the result will obviously benefit our farmers and all our people. History has evidenced and has overwhelmingly proven a low tariff or tariff for revenue only has always brought nothing but distress, ruin, and chaos to our industries and our laborers. The farmers were the chief sufferers after the war. We passed the emergency tariff bill stopping imports of all staple farm produce from abroad, thus giving them a chance to recover. We also gave $25,000,000 to the Farm Loan Board to lend to farmers on long-time loans with easy payments. We then voted a billion dollars as a revolving fund to finance foreign sales of farm products, and in this way we have put the farmers on quite as good a footing as they were before the war.

This emergency law is now taken care of in the permanent tariff bill. This tariff bill has been an enormous task, but as it is now finished we can feel that our industrial works and our agricultural activities are again on solid footing, and I have no doubt that the American people will see to it that no more panic-producing free trade will take its place for a generation to come. One of the reasons this country has been prosperous during the last half century is that the wages and living conditions of our working people have been kept far above the European standard by means of a protective tariff. Our theory is that we should have an import duty high enough to equalize the difference in the cost of production here and in the Old World.

In the early days of the Wilson administration the import rates were greatly reduced and the free list very much enlarged. Only that the World War started shortly afterwards we would have seen great disaster following that act. The war stopped importation and we became the great exporting nation of the world. When the war finally closed there were millions of idle men and women in Europe who were willing to work for any kind of wages offered. Wages here were the highest ever known. So when the flood of goods made by these cheap laborers came in direct competition with our highly paid labor the natural result followed. The American mills closed and millions of our people became idle, while those across the water became busy supplying our markets with material that should have been made here.

Without proper protection we would be transferring our prosperity abroad. That is what we Republicans are opposed to. We believe in keeping our prosperity at home and having our own people enjoy it. With this end in view we have this bill under consideration, and if passed will give adequate protection to American industries. The rates have not been made so high that it might have a tendency to foster monopolies, nor unduly increase the price to consumers. As soon as this law gets in full operation we will see business conditions settle down and a long period of prosperity will be the result.

Thousands of items have been considered in this bill. The Ways and Means Committee has met for months, giving each item consideration and taking all the evidence relative to the advisability and effect of a high or low tariff. I have appeared before that committee giving my views, as well as before the Finance Committee of the Senate, and know of the great task they have had in arriving at their conclusions. I believed then and do now that we could have derived considerable revenue from a small tariff on oil and wood pulp, and that the effect of it all would have been greatly to the benefit of the consumer. I was also disappointed about the final action in the Senate relative to ferromanganese, and still hope that something may be done to make a more equitable adjustment on this item.

The bill as a whole, I believe, is the best schedule that any Congress could prepare, and that when it is in operation that it will redound to the credit of this Congress and to the welfare and prosperity of our Nation and people. I will, therefore, support the bill.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, after spending a year and a half on the tariff bill, much of the time wasted, our friends the enemy are trying to add a few more delays. They are enjoying it more than some on this side of the Chamber seem to be enjoying it. Yesterday they gave us dyestuffs. To-day it is sugar. To-morrow it may be wool, or butter, or what not. There are a thousand items in this comprehensive bill on each one of which they may take delight to force a vote—to make some squirm. In the silence of an elevator I overheard one Democrat say to another, "We made them run to cover over dyes; we split them wide open; let's try it with something else; its fun to see them run like scared rabbits."

I am afraid that some on this side have taken too seriously what is a mere trick in politics. On the other side they were not so much interested in cheap dyes as they were in cheap politics. They added "potash fertilizer" to double the scare, according to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. I guess they did double it for some.

Of course, there was a basis for the "revolt" on this side of the Chamber. I did not like what our conferees agreed to in this matter of dyes. I protested to my colleague on the committee [Mr. GREEN], but after I had heard his statement I made up my mind that there was not much at stake. What is called an embargo is not an embargo in fact. Under it we will continue to import dyes, plenty of them. The arrangement was only for one year, after which it may be terminated by the President if it has not worked well in the meantime, and in any event it comes to an end in two years.

I am willing to do something to develop the dye industry in this country. Things still look so warlike in Europe that it may be well for us to have our own dye factories and our own potential means for making war explosives. Under these conditions it might have been well to have continued the status quo in this industry. But in the attempt to get more than they should have it may be that its friends will get for it less than is needed to develop this essential industry. They are like the ambitious man who, in trying to mount his horse, landed on the other side.

For one I was not willing to protest the action of the conferees so far as to help the enemies of this bill in their game of obstruction, although I would at any time be willing to cooperate with them in any sincere effort to lower some duties which I may think are too high.

But we have to make a stand somewhere on this tariff bill, or we shall never get through with it. The final stand must always be short of perfection. From my district viewpoint it would have been easier to make a stand on dyes than on sugar, or than it would be on wool or butter, or whatever item they may bring up to force a separate record vote.

If we are protectionists in truth, then we must be protectionists in a national sense. We can not have protection for our own pet industry and deny equal protection to other industries. We of the Middle West, on the whole, have fared the best in the making of this tariff. The agricultural schedules are the highest in the history of tariff making, while the average for the other schedules are lower than those in any previous protective tariff bill. We have forced the industrial East to accept these agricultural rates, and on the whole they have accepted them willingly enough. It is well for us and also for them, for without the basic prosperity of the farm we can have no prosperity that is either permanent or general.

Denmark can sell butter in New York cheaper than Iowa can sell it in that great American market. Australia has cheaper wools than the most favored sheep belt in this country. The tidewater industries can get their corn from the Argentine for less money than they can get it from the Mississippi Valley fields. We have asked that our farm industries be protected. But if we of the midwest vote to break down the industries of the East, may not the East retaliate?

What shall it advantage us to get the coloring matter in the abbreviated gowns of our lovely flappers for a little less when it may mean that we have to sell all our butter and wool and even corn for much less? If we want to save our records on dyes, may not the eastern men want to save their records on foods? They also have constituencies they must consider.

As for the fertilizer item they added so cleverly to make us midwestern Members tremble, what shall it benefit us to get fertilizers for a little less when with them we will only produce more of things of which I sometimes think we already have too much for decent returns? Corn, for instance—why grow more corn when we have billions of bushels unsold?

But if it is fertilizers that we really want, can we not get enough of them in America? We have unlimited deposits of potash in this country, if we will only make it possible to develop them. We can make unlimited supplies as factory by-products. When we can help ourselves, why continue to be dependent on Alsace? Why not make America fertilize itself as well as feed itself?

I fear we have lost our heads about fertilizers. Real estate promoters in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals, where they have laid out a city as large as New York with Chicago added as a suburb—and they are now selling these boom town lots all over the land—have proposed to give to a millionaire who added $160,000,000 to his cash surplus last year a plant on which the taxpayers have already spent $100,000,000—and all on the indefinite promise that the said millionaire will make 45,000 tons of fixed nitrogen a year, but with the proviso that he must have his cost plus 8 per cent. Let us be thankful at least it is not so much as the historic 10 per cent of the war period of unconscionable profiteering.

I am afraid we are outdoing that certain man of the Scriptures who sold his birthright for a mess of pottage.

I am not alarmed about fertilizers—not in Iowa. We are told that 1 acre of alfalfa will fix $13 worth of nitrogen in a single season, and the alfalfa plant gets the nitrogen from the same reservoir, the air. If we will grow alfalfa, we will get not only the nitrogen but we will have the hay and the seed. If our soil will not grow this clover, soya beans will do the same thing for the land. We do not have to give away for a hundred years to come the water power that belongs to all the people for the sake of a mess of fixed nitrogen when clovers and soya beans will get the same results for us.

But I may be taking these Democratic efforts too seriously. The proponents of these recommittal separate votes are not really concerned over the articles they name. With them one article is as legitimate as another. They are just playing politics, and they will laugh at us on this side if we will sweat in fear and cowardice. They caught us on their dyestuff; I hope they will not catch us on sugar, for after that they will put wool and butter and corn up to us, and if our eastern provincialists should vote with the Democrats on these farm staples, as many of us voted with the Democrats on dyes, we shall lose all that we of the agricultural belts have gained through this tariff.

I am for protection. It is the historic American policy. It has given us 124 years of prosperity—while the opposed policy has given us 32 years of adversity—since this Nation began. I am for protection, not in spots, not to favor ourselves, but I am for it as a truly national policy. We can not use it to build up our particular section, but we must use it, if at all, to build up all alike. If prosperity is not general it is not worth having.

If we are protectionists, let us be such in fact. Let us stand together. Let us not be stampeded and scattered by every trick in the game of politics that the opposition may try to play on this floor.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, I voted against this bill when it passed the House over a year ago. My reasons for so doing were stated at the time. Its chief purpose, as I saw it, was to perpetuate the ruthless profiteering of war days under what was called the "American valuation" plan. That plan, in name, has been eliminated, though the effect of the excessive rates in this bill will still encourage thousands of manufacturers in their mad scramble for wealth and protect them in piling up huge profits at the expense of the farmers, wage earners, and consumers of manufactured articles.

It is said that the duty on farm products is higher in this bill than in any previous one. I think, perhaps, that is true. But it is not so much a question of what the duty on farm products is as it is a question of the relation of the duty on what the farmer sells to the duty on the articles he buys. If the duty on $100 worth of hogs which the farmer sells amounts to $10, and the duty on $100 worth of manufactured articles which he buys also amounts to $10, then, so far as the farmer and the manufacturer are concerned, there is no unjust discrimination. But if the duty on $100 worth of hogs is $10, and the duty on $100 worth of manufactured articles which he must buy amounts to $30, then there is an unjust discrimination against the farmer.

Let us take a hundred dollars' worth of shovels, spades, scoops, scythes, and the like; the duty under this bill amounts to $33⅓, while the actual duty on $100 worth of hogs at the price they are bringing to-day amounts to less than $5. The duty on a clock valued at $10 is $9. The duty on poultry enough to pay for that clock, at the price poultry is bringing the farmer to-day, is only $3.75.

The duty on $100 worth of bedspreads, quilts, and the like is $40, while the duty on fresh milk enough to pay for those articles at the price farmers are getting for their milk to-day, is only $10.30.

The duty on a $5 razor is $2.70, while the duty on corn enough to pay for it, at the present price, is only 90 cents.

The duty on a shotgun valued at $40 is about $28, while the duty on butter enough to pay for it, at the present price for butter, is only $8.

The duty on a pocketknife valued at $1.25 is about 75 cents, while the duty on wheat enough to pay for it is only 30 cents.

The duty on a $50 silk dress is $30, while the duty on eggs enough to pay for that dress, at the present price farmers get for eggs, is only $16.

What is true of the above articles is true of practically everything the farmer has to buy as compared with what he has to sell. He is protected only one-half to one-fifth what the manufacturer is protected on his wares. Nor is this all. The higher the price of the manufactured article, the higher the protection. To illustrate: The duty on a suit of underwear valued at $1 is about 47 cents. If the value of that suit goes to $2 the duty automatically goes to 94 cents. But the duty on a bushel of corn is 15 cents, and it makes no difference whether that corn is worth 50 cents a bushel or $10 a bushel. In other words, the higher the price of the manufactured article the higher is the protection, while the higher the price of farm products the lower the protection.

On the face of the bill it is thus apparent that the framers of this tariff measure, while claiming to favor the farmer, have actually discriminated against him and accorded vastly greater protection to the manufacturer from whom the farmer must buy. As a matter of fact, the framers of the bill have placed just sufficient duty upon the farmers' products to provide a cloak behind which excessive and extortionate duties might be levied for the enrichment of the real tariff beneficiaries, the trusts and combinations, engaged in exploiting the farmer when he sells his products and when he buys as a consumer.

There is even a more fundamental injustice in this tariff bill as it affects the farmer. The protection afforded the manufacturer counts for something because large imports of manufactured articles can be shipped from abroad into this country. Many of the articles upon which this bill gives protection to the farmer, on the other hand, are not imported to any extent, and the protection given in the bill does not benefit the farmer at all.

This tariff bill is thus nothing more nor less than a gold brick for the farmer. It levies excessive rates on manufactured articles which will greatly increase the prices the farmer must pay, and in exchange it gives the farmer a mess of pottage—and a very meager mess of it, at that—in the form of much lower duties, many of which are of no real benefit because levied on articles which the farmer himself exports and which are not generally imported into this country.

This is the transparent scheme which big business has concocted in an effort to fool the farmer and to grease the ways for a tariff bill which it is estimated will tax the American people $3,000,000,000 a year in increased living costs.

Again, manufacturers usually control their own markets and their own prices. The steel trust controls its markets; the oil trust controls its market; also the woolen trust, the leather trust, the packing trust, the tanning trust, and every other trust. Not only this, but they likewise control the price of the raw material that goes into the manufactured article. They say what they shall receive for the finished product and they say what they will pay the farmer for the raw material. This puts the farmer to a still further disadvantage in his struggle for existence. When his hogs, his cattle, his eggs, his butter, his milk, and his cheese are ready to sell he has to sell them. He can not hold them for another year even for another month. He has to sell them whenever they are ready to sell. Some of these products are consumed in the localities where they are produced, but most of them go to the packers who have facilities for hoarding them all, and they do hoard them. They hoard them to such an extent that they do not have to buy any live stock or dairy products of the farmers to-day, or to-morrow, next week, or next year if they do not want to. They have enough on hand to supply the trade for that length of time. But the farmer has to sell them when ready. Having to sell them when they are ready, and the packer not having to buy unless he wants to, means that the packer fixes the price at whatever he pleases and the farmer must accept it, and this bill absolutely underwrites this situation. It perpetuates the profiteering practiced in war times, and the only limit to prices consumers will have to pay is their ability to pay. That is what happened during the war and it is what will happen under this bill.

But it is said, "The President has power to raise and lower the duties in a way that will compel fair and equable prices." That will be all right when we have a President who is in sympathy with the great mass of people, with the farmers and wage earners, with the consumers; a President who knows their problems, their struggles, their lives. But when we have a President whose sympathies are not with these but with the business interests of the country, knows nothing of the struggles of the great mass of people, one who feels that a prosperous government depends upon the prosperity of big business instead of upon the prosperity of all the people and particularly those who produce the wealth, then the power to fix duty or prices is all wrong. Every time the Food Administration fixed the price of a manufactured article during the war the price was increased above the market price. Every time he fixed the price of an agricultural product, it was fixed below the market price. I do not believe in that kind of price fixing. I believe in giving the farmer the same control over the price of the articles he produces that the manufacturer exercises over what he produces. But this bill gives big business concerns the absolute power to fix prices on what they buy as well as on those they sell.

It is argued that this bill will enable manufacturers to pay good wages to their employees. But the trouble with that argument is, and always has been, that the most highly protected industries have always paid the lowest wages. It will be remembered that the railroads asked permission—and this Congress granted it—to raise their rates 35 per cent to 40 per cent two years ago last March, so they could pay their men a fair wage. But they no sooner got their rates increased than they began to cut wages. So I do not believe there is very much to the argument that this bill will afford good wages. The desire for profits and still greater profits will be just as strong under this bill as any other, and big profits will mean low wages, wages that will be just as low as they can be forced. Besides, what does it profit a wage earner to get high wages and have it all taken from him by the price he must pay for the bare necessities of life? He received high wages during the war and yet those wages only purchased about 85 per cent as much of the necessities of life as the low wages he received before the war.

Again, the Senate placed a duty of 7 cents a pound on coconut oil shipped into this country and used in food products. That duty was calculated to save the dairy interests of the United States from the fate handed to it by the filled cheese industry 40 years ago. And yet when this bill was sent to conference the House conferees succeeded in having that provision of the bill stricken out in order to save the food adulterators of the United States at the expense of the farmers and consumers. These are a few of the things that are handed to the wealth producers and consumers of this country in this bill.

The rates in this bill are indefensible. Foreign countries owe the United States about $11,000,000,000. That debt can not be paid in gold, because those countries have not the gold with which to pay. That debt must be paid chiefly in manufactured products. But the duties in this bill are so high as to practically prohibit the importation of foreign manufactured articles. Everybody knows that. The framers of this bill know it. Those that are backing it know it, and that is just what is desired. The next move will be to bring pressure to bear upon this Congress to cancel that foreign debt. The United States Chamber of Commerce has been advocating just that thing. After this bill becomes a law this institution will come before Congress and point out that these foreign countries can not pay their debts, and will advocate their cancellation. Then their members will proceed to make billions out of the people of this and other countries, and when our United States Treasury needs money we will levy upon the backs of the people, just as we did when we gave the railroads nearly a billion and a half dollars, just as we did when we gave Liberia, with a population of less than 20 civilized people, $5,000,000, just as we will do to make up for the $400,000,000 in taxes we took off the shoulders of the rich, just as we will do so long as we permit the war grafters to reach over into the United States Treasury and take what they want as long as there is a penny in sight.

Nor is this all. Over a year ago the dye embargo contained in this bill as originally presented to this House was defeated by this House. The bill went over to the Senate and the embargo was again defeated. The bill was sent to conference, and the conferees exceeded their authority, put the embargo into the bill again, and it was again defeated. Then the conferees went back into conference and, for all practical purposes, placed an embargo on dye by raising the duty, and they have given the President power to place an absolute embargo on dyes, a power no man should have.

I am a Republican. I believe in Republicanism as laid down by Lincoln. I believe in a tariff that will measure the difference in cost of production at home and abroad; that will measure the difference in wages at home and abroad. I believe in a tariff that will foster and build up infant industries. But the Steel Trust is no longer an infant; the Meat Trust is no longer an infant; neither is the Shoe Trust, the Leather Trust, and many other trusts. Whenever any of these combinations of wealth get so large as to make their brags, as some of them do, that they are "bigger than the Government," then I believe it is about time that the Government, the people, give them to understand they no longer need the protecting arm of Uncle Sam to bolster them up.

Another thing I desire to call attention to. During the last two years farm values have been deflated, forced down, $18,000,000,000. During this last spring, in my district alone, the acreage of farm lands advertised for sale to pay taxes exceeded those of former years by 200,000 acres, and the number of city and village properties so advertised exceeded those of former years by 33 per cent. This does not take into account the mortgage foreclosures and small business failures in agricultural communities reaching into the thousands upon thousands. But during the last year, and while these sales for taxes and business failures continue, those combinations of wealth most highly protected under this bill made in profits off the producers of wealth in this country $8,000,000,000. These, together with other objectionable features in this bill which I will not take the time to enumerate, force me to vote against it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The Fordney Tariff Act just enacted is the most favorable tariff law to the agricultural interests of the country ever passed by Congress. This statement is made without reservation and is substantiated by an analysis of the bill and a comparison of its provisions with the provisions of former tariff acts.

In order that this may more readily appear I have prepared a brief comparison of the rates fixed by the various tariff laws since 1909 covering the principal products of the farms of the United States, which follows. In preparing this table I have confined myself for purposes of comparison to articles mentioned in the emergency tariff law of 1921:

	Republican—Payne-Aldrich, 1909.	Democratic—Underwood, 1913.	Republican—Emergency, 1921.	Republican—Fordney, 1922.
Oats	15 cents per bushel	6 cents per bushel	[1]	15 cents per bushel.

In the above table the following weights constitute a bushel: Beans, 60 pounds; flaxseed, 56 pounds; potatoes, 60 pounds; corn, 56 pounds; wheat, 60 pounds; barley, 48 pounds; apples, 50 pounds; cherries, 50 pounds; rye, 56 pounds; oats, 32 pounds; and onions, 57 pounds.

A glance at this table calls to our minds several significant facts. The first impression is the absolute failure of the Democratic Underwood Tariff Act, just repealed, to protect anything that the farmer raises, a condition which, after the close of the World War, would have produced the worst disaster to the farmers of the country possible had it not been for the temporary help afforded by the Republican emergency tariff act of 1921. Farm animals on the hoof, potatoes, wheat, unwashed wool, fresh milk, cream, olives, rye, lemons, rice of all kinds, onions, peanuts, beans, flaxseed, sugars, molasses, butter, eggs, cheese, and vegetable oils are given higher protective rates than in the last Republican Payne-Aldrich or any preceding tariff act, while corn and oats have the same rates as the Payne Act, and barley has a slight reduction.

On the other hand, it is at once noted that there are reductions in the duties on prepared meats, wheat flour, washed and scoured wools, and preserved milk. Or, in other words, while the farmer is given additional protection on his raw materials he is given the benefit of a considerable reduction in the tariff on the manufactured article.

Other schedules in the act further emphasize this. For example:

The average duty on earthenware products is the lowest ever written into a Republican tariff law.

The duties on steel and iron products and metallic substances are the lowest in Republican tariff legislation.

Lumber of all kinds is on the free list.

The duty on linen goods is the lowest in Republican history.

While the duty on the farmer's product, unwashed wool, is higher, the duty on scoured wool, the basis of all wool clothing, and the rates on all sorts of woolen goods, are much less than in any preceding Republican tariff.

All leather, harness, shoes, and all leather goods are on the free list.

The duties on cotton manufactured goods are less than in any preceding Republican tariff act in this generation.

The tariff on blackstrap molasses for stock feed is reduced for the first time in history to a nominal amount.

It will be thus seen that while the farmer gets more protection for his products, if there is any advantage to be had from lessened tariffs in manufactured products which he must buy, he gets it.

The Fordney Tariff Act of 1922 is the best tariff act ever written, so far as the American farmer is concerned.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of the privilege accorded during the debate on the tariff bill conference report to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD, now, a speech made by me when that bill was debated in the House in July, 1921. This speech was reserved by me at that time for revision, and was overlooked. I have waited a long time to put it in the RECORD, but during that time very little in the way of legislation has taken place. The party in power have taken over a year to get the bill back into the House. The country has waited patiently for them to do something, but they have done nothing, and so I put my old speech in the RECORD. It fits the times and conditions now no less than it did when uttered.

The speech follows:

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I happened to be in the room when the remarks were being made by the gentleman from Ohio to the effect that Germany was now flooding the United States with her cheap goods; that Germany was not only flooding the United States but practically flooding the world with her goods, cheapened by bounties, cheapened by special favors, by Government support to such an extent that we could not compete with her at all and probably nobody else could compete with her unless through an exorbitantly high tariff. I could not help wondering where debt-ridden Germany, with her immense indemnity to pay, got the money to pay such bounties and grant such favors. But if that argument is true and if we must protect our industries against such a competitor as Germany by rates sufficiently high to protect them, then we must absolutely exclude all the balance of the world from our commerce, since a tariff high enough to exclude Germany must necessarily exclude the products of all other countries. That is perfectly plain. But, gentlemen, I want to try in my brief time—of course, I can not discuss its details; I could not discuss its details, anyhow, because I am not on the committee and have not familiarized myself with the technical points—but I want to try to discuss some of the great issues involved in this bill upon which the welfare of the world to-day depends. It was a world calamity that the Democratic Party was defeated in 1918, thereby blocking the chance of effective and reconstructive legislation. The one sole opportunity in the great world of adopting a league between the great nations to insure peace was lost, and to-day we stand as a shattered and dismembered society of nations without guidance or leadership in any way toward the upbuilding and uplift of humanity. After defeating the ratification of the Versailles treaty in 1918, the Republican Party came in power in the legislative branch of the Government and locked the wheels of reconstruction. There was only one measure passed by this great so-called party of construction and reconstruction during the whole of the Sixty-sixth Congress—the Esch railroad bill. What of it? I am frank to say it is the biggest measure yet passed by the Republican Party. But whether it be for ill or for good, let those who know it and who have watched its operation and who begin to appreciate the fact that it will reach into the Treasury of the United States and draw out before its operation is ended over a billion of dollars of the hard-earned tax money of the American people, let them say.

What else has been done by this constructive party, even up to this good day? They have passed the emergency farmers' agricultural tariff bill, and its best friend can only say it has done no harm. Then they have passed the peace resolution and appropriation measures. These constitute the record of the construction and reconstruction measures of the party in power up to date. When they passed the peace resolution, the way they talked about it you would think that all the world hung in suspense awaiting its final adoption as a great beneficent policy of a great party. But since then, even a paper so friendly toward the administration and the Republican Party as the Washington Star no longer ago than yesterday said that it would not, even if it were dropped in the ocean, make a splash. That is about the truth. But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to discuss this measure, if I may, from the standpoint of the present condition of the world. Our Republican friends do not seem to realize that the condition of the world is new so far as America is concerned, that while the tariff question may have been a local one or a national one for ourselves and our own concerns heretofore, it has become and is now an international one, to be weighed by us on its effect upon other nations as well as our own, and that the whole world is affected by the policies of the different nations with regard to trade between each other. We were told by the chairman of the committee in his opening address that all the nations were guarding themselves against competition with each other by high tariff walls. He stated that England was imposing a rate of tariff higher on the average than we were. I question the accuracy of that statement, if I understood it correctly. He said that France, that Germany, and that Japan had a rate of tariff duties higher than ours. The excuse in this country for high tariff duties is that it is necessary in order to protect our high living standard against the pauper labor of those countries. What is the excuse for imposing a high tariff in Japan? [Applause on the Democratic side.] To protect her against the pauper labor of America? No; but they find some excuse. You will always find the beneficiary of a special favor giving some excuse by which he can hold on to the favor. Let me show you that the Republican Party by proceeding to adopt this tariff now is not carrying out its own ideas. When the greater men of its party framed its platform they said at Chicago:

The uncertain and unsettled condition of international balances, the abnormal economic and trade situation of the world, and the impossibility of forecasting accurately even the near future preclude the formulation of a definite program to meet conditions a year hence. * * *

The world condition has not improved. America has done nothing to improve it. Even in that convention they realized the turmoil of the world and the impossibility of imposing a high tariff which would not run amuck. Now, gentlemen, let me ask you to contemplate the impossibility of passing a tariff which will protect this country against all imports or even against a great quantity of imports under the conditions that exist without absolutely prohibiting all imports. I will take the illustration given by the chairman of the committee. He said upon a given quantity of identical goods imported into the port of New York the cost, if made in Canada, would be $1,000; the cost, if made in Germany, would be $800; and the cost, if made in Japan, would be $500. Now, I want to ask, are you going to put a tariff rate up high enough to protect us against that $500 product of Japanese industry? If it protects us and puts us on only an equal footing with Japan and gives us an opportunity to compete with Japan in the markets of the United States, does it not absolutely exclude the German goods that cost $300 more, and does it not exclude the Canadian goods that cost twice as much? If all that the gentleman from Michigan says is true, there is no salvation for the American manufacturer except in closing our ports to foreign trade, and then you leave no market for our surplus agricultural products. Gentlemen, when you get your theory to working, what are you going to do? Are you going to impose a tariff wall high enough to protect the American manufacturer from the very lowest cost basis of any of his competitors, and then whatever market you give in America give it only to the most pauper-stricken part of the world? May we trade just a little with Japan but with no other nation?

That is not all. We have different manufacturers of goods in this country producing the same goods at different cost prices. Here is a factory well operated; here is one efficiently conducted, that has small overhead charges, with costs reduced to a minimum, manufacturing a class of goods at a minimum American cost. Here is another factory making the same goods and struggling hard for its existence, that has 10 per cent higher cost in production than the other factory. What are you going to do?

Are you going to adjust your tariff so as to equalize the difference in the cost of production between the most costly manufacturer in the United States and the most economical manufacturer abroad? If so, then in the illustration given by the chairman of the committee you would have to adjust your tariff wall high enough to protect the highest cost manufacturer in America against the cheapest of Japanese product. That policy would permit our high-cost manufacturer to compete with Japan, but it would greatly enrich the better-managed industries.

They say that the standard by which they will measure the height of their wall of protection is the difference in cost of production in America and abroad, and that that is to be ascertained by finding the difference in wages in America and abroad. The cost of the labor, I presume they would admit, that enters into a given unit of manufacture, and not daily wage of the laborer, is the fact to be found, and yet they are always illustrating by the daily wage of Japan without telling the people that ours is a great land of machinery, that this is a great land of mechanism and of efficiency, and that over there they work by hand. They built the Suez Canal with pauper labor at a few cents per day, while we built a greater canal, with great machinery of modern invention, and did the work many times cheaper per unit of construction than they did the Suez Canal work. Why, I saw a great steamship in Japan take on her coal by hand, carrying it up ladders in baskets. That is not all. Let us face the conditions that exist to-day. A new world is here. America is in a position she never was in before. Prior to August 1, 1914, we were the great debtor Nation, the greatest debtor Nation on the earth. And for 20 years prior to that time every year had given us a balance of trade in products in our favor running from $500,000,000 to $800,000,000 a year. What did we do with it? I will tell you what we did with it. At that time we owed to peoples outside of the United States, in the bonds of cities, in the bonds of our corporations, in the private loans of individuals, to the European holders of great municipal, State, and other obligations about $8,000,000,000, and every year we had to pay the interest on that indebtedness. How did we pay it? By the balance of trade in our favor.

Every year we had thousands of tourists that went over to the Old World and scattered the money of the rich of America like water on the Sahara Desert in European countries. Some two or three hundred million dollars was spent that way, as has been estimated. How did we pay it? By the balance of trade in our favor; by the products of America going abroad over and above the products of the world that came here. In addition to that we had thousands, if not millions, of immigrants fresh from the Old World, who every day were sending back little pittances from their earnings to their home people. Hundreds of millions of dollars went that way. How did we pay it? We paid it by a balance of trade in the favor of America. What else? Why, the peoples of Scotland, the thrifty old Scottish hoarders, gathering the accumulation from their thrift for centuries, sent their money over here and invested it in various corporations and enterprises in the United States, as well as loaning it to the farmers and home builders of the United States. The foreign owners of property and corporation stock in the United States received the rental and profits of their business and property here and sent it abroad or reinvested it here, thereby increasing our obligations. How did we meet all these drafts upon us as a country? Why surely by the balance of trade in our favor. I tried to figure it out. We had to send across the waters in the neighborhood of a billion of dollars every year, and we sent it either in cash through our tourists or through the immigrant remittances, or we sent it in goods that made up the balance of trade in favor of America. Does not this balance of trade in our favor show that for all these years we have produced more than we consumed at home? Will we not continue to do so? I think we will.

WHAT WILL WE DO WITH OUR SURPLUS PRODUCTS?

This question and this answer at first seem to give strength to the protective theory by showing that we produce more than we consume, and therefore the necessity for stimulating exports and at the same time limiting imports. If disposing of our surplus was nothing more than transporting it to waiting markets of the world and selling it there without a competitor, that would be true; we would simply sell our goods, buy a few things which we could not raise or produce here, and collect the balance in cash after crediting our account with the price we paid for the few things bought, and bring that cash home. But our goods meet with competition in those foreign markets, and we find them in lack of cash, of which we already have the lion's share, and they are unwilling to go further in debt to us for goods even if we were anxious to credit them.

How, then, must we meet the situation? Surely not by crippling the trade of our customers. Surely not by destroying the prosperity of our customers. Surely not by simply and only increasing their debt to us without prospect of ultimately receiving from them at least the interest on their debts in something other than increasing—ever increasing—debits. I think it can be shown that all creditor nations have found it necessary in some way sooner or later to import more, in goods of some kind, than they export. I do not believe we can become any permanent exception to that rule. I do not believe it would be healthy for us if we could, because we would so increase the obligations of the world to us that in the end we would simply own all the industries of the world or levy tribute on all the world while excluding the products of the world from our markets. Will the world stand for this? Can it stand for it? Will not international repudiation, based on impossibility of payment, raise its ugly head? Meantime, while impoverishing other countries, by maintaining our favorable balance of trade, if we can, what happens here in America? Our manufacturers, who are organized so they can sell their surplus cheaper abroad than they sell the same products at home, will find it harder and harder and harder to compete abroad with goods produced here, especially after paying the high retallation duties imposed by other countries, and will find it necessary first to grind labor here to the very limit of endurance, and will find even then that labor can not exist here and pay the high price demanded by capital for its products sold here without being paid a higher wage in money than foreign labor receives. Strikes, lockouts, and strife between labor and capital will add confusion to our industrial life, and capital, or money, which flows freely between nations will begin to go over our border line and build its plants abroad in order to escape the import duties and employ the cheap labor of foreign countries. For half a century capital fought home labor by importing cheap foreign labor, filling to overflowing the manufacturing centers of the country with cheaper foreign laborers. That recourse has been partly blocked by stringent immigration laws forced upon Congress by union labor. What shall now prevent capital going abroad and in the foreign countries employing cheap labor in competition with American labor, at least in the manufacture of goods to be sold outside of the United States? Already Canada has grown tired of our dumping our surplus manufactures into her trade and has adopted high tariffs and stringent antidumping laws, with what result? American capital is heavily investing in manufacturing plants in Canada, as shown in this article from the New York World:

[Special to the World.]

TORONTO, September 3.—The American industrial invasion of Canada continues unchecked. In addition to the 700 Canadian branches of American industries, already established, most of which have come into being during the last 10 or 12 years, there are said to be at the present moment not less than 200 other American factories seeking Canadian locations.

While these numbers represent only a fraction of the total of Canadian industries, their importance is greater than is indicated by the numbers because in no case is the American factory any little 2 by 4 experimental concern. Often it is the most important plant in its line. It is characteristic of the American manufacturer entering Canada that he is prepared to do business on a big scale from the outset. He finds conditions much the same as at home, and he generally has ample capital. In this he differs radically from many Canadian and British competitors, the former of whom are sometimes handicapped by lack of capital or experience, and the latter by distance from home and by caution.

According to one estimate there is now an American investment in Canadian industry of not less than $200,000,000. Several individual plants represent with equipment investments in excess of $3,000,000 each. Almost invariably they are modern and up to date with labor-saving devices everywhere and efficiency written all over them.

MADE AS CANADIAN AS POSSIBLE.

What the ultimate commercial and even political effect of this invasion is going to be is a matter for speculation. In most cases the Canadian branch professes to be a purely Canadian concern. Often it incorporates the word Canadian in its firm name, generally to advantage, particularly if its competitor is not so wise. Or take the case of the makers of a famous brand of American candies named after a national heroine. When this firm came to Canada they sensed that a reminder of revolutionary days would not be appropriate, and they therefore sought a Canadian heroine, finding a euphonious name of valiant and romantic memory in the records of the War of 1812. That the original brought disaster to American troops in those days did not prevent this American firm of a later century from using her name and features as a trade-mark for the Canadian end of their business which duplicates in methods and extent their American organization.

In some cases some Canadian capital is included in the business, and the employees are largely Canadian, though many of the heads of departments and expert technicians are undoubtedly imported.

But when all this had been said the fact remains that the ownership and control remain essentially American. If there are profits, as there generally are, they go to American shareholders just as absolutely as do the profits on American manufactures that are made at home and imported for sale into Canada. It is a species of absentee landlordism on a large scale.

BRED BY TARIFF AND EXCHANGE.

So far Canadian manufacturers have professed to welcome this movement which is of course a direct result of the Canadian protective tariff, aided materially in recent years by the high adverse exchange rate. According to their view, if Canadians buy goods made in America it has a tendency to make Canada a political adjunct, but if they buy American goods made in Canada it is all right. Nevertheless the situation that is growing up is unique among nations.

American industries come to Canada primarily to serve the Canadian market with "Made in Canada" goods, catering effectively to local tastes and methods. But Canada's 9,000,000 population does not begin to account for the total volume of the movement. Many American factories expect that shortly there will be a preferential arrangement within the British Empire which will give a plant located in Canada a tremendous advantage over one located in the United States.

The majority of the American branch factories in Canada are located in Ontario where there is abundant and cheap electric power, competent though not low priced labor, and living conditions which in many respects are not surpassed on the continent. The border cities along the Detroit River are studded with American factories, including such well-known names as Ford and Studebaker and allied industries. Toronto has 200 American plants, many of them household names throughout America. Hamilton has the International Harvester Co., Canadian Westinghouse, and many others. London, Woodstock, Guelph, Kitchener, Brantford, and many smaller towns all have their quota.

Quebec Province has fewer industries, but many of them are important. A number of cities are now almost entirely dependent for their prosperity on their American plants. At St. John's, Quebec, for example, the Singer Co. has a plant covering 50 acres, and across the way a collar factory from Troy, N. Y., supplies its Canadian patrons. Drummondville, St. Hyacinthe, Sherbrooke, and of course Montreal, all have large American industries. Quebec Province offers the special advantage of contented and generally abundant labor.

This is the way capital cares for American labor. It does not care what country is hurt or helped, provided only it draws its dividends. American capital not only sends its American dollars but American machinery and American skilled labor abroad. You will find American money, American machinery, and American skilled labor to-day in every country with which we trade; and you will find them in all these countries in greater and greater proportion as time goes on. Canada, Mexico, Central and South America, and the Far East give ample evidence of the truth of what I am saying. The tax bill just passed by the House encourages our capital going abroad by exempting it and the income derived from it from domestic taxation. These foreign investments of American money look to us for protection but pay us no taxes.

What, then, shall we do about it? Shall we carry our industries to foreign lands, exempting them from taxes here, to encourage their going abroad, or shall we keep them here and supply those lands largely with goods made here? Shall we remain the greatest importing and exporting Nation, and therefore the strongest and most prosperous, in the world, or shall we by shortsighted selfishness and subservience to special interests become isolated, an Ishmaelite among the nations? I believe that the utmost liberality in our tariff toward other nations will be for our highest good. Under that policy no tariff would be levied above the rate that would produce the greatest revenue, and that would be the rate at which the foreign producer could compete with profit against a home producer and against whom the home producer must exercise skill and economy to keep from being beaten. Such a policy would make our manufacturer sell his goods to our home consumer at approximately the same price at which he sells the same goods in foreign lands; would not unjustly burden any class of our people for the benefit of another, but would let all live and prosper. Such a policy is the enlightened policy, but under it, horror of horrors, the ordinary American woman might frequently wear calico or stockings made in England or Germany and just as frequently the English or German woman might wear calico or stockings made in the United States. Our cotton mills can compete with foreign mills just as surely as our steel mills can, and for much the same reasons. The steel and iron producers have been the most insistent of tariff advocates for their product, and yet in 1899 Charles M. Schwab wrote these words:

"I know positively that England can not produce pig iron at actual cost for less than $11.50 per ton, even allowing no profit on raw materials, and can not put pig iron into a rail with their most efficient works for less than $7.50 per ton. This would make rails at net cost to them of $19. We can sell at this price and ship abroad so as to net us $16 at works for foreign business, nearly as good as home business has been. What is true of rails is equally true of other steel products. As a result of this, we are going to control the steel business of the world.

"You know we can make rails for less than $12 per ton, leaving a nice margin on foreign business. Besides this, foreign costs are going to increase year by year, because they have not the raw materials, while ours are going to decrease. The result of all this is that we will be able to sell our surplus abroad, run our works full all the time, and get the best practice and costs in this way."

The trouble with Mr. Schwab and all other tariff beneficiaries is they do not want to live and let live; they want the American people as a whole to bear them on their backs and make for them such fortunes as only avarice asks for.

Now, to prove how surely right Mr. Schwab was in both his estimates and his forecast we need only to look at the balance sheet of the United States Steel Corporation. That tells the story, and tells it all, because the detailed and most admirable annual reports of the Steel Corporation give us the exact number of their employees and the total amount of all the wages and salaries paid to them, thus clearly indicating the total labor cost of their entire product, and they also give us the net earnings of the corporation, from which all interest on invested capital, all interest on bonds, and all dividends on both preferred and common stock must be paid. The following figures are therefore taken directly from these annual reports, and they can be quickly verified by reference to those official documents, namely:

While men like Mr. Schwab always ask for protection to protect labor, you see that while the nearly 200,000 employees of the Steel Trust had to live out of what they received and most of them had nothing left the net profits of the Steel Trust was nearly equal to the gross amount of the wages received by all these employees during these 14 years, and it must not be forgotten that these laborers were mostly foreigners and worked 12 hours per day seven days in the week. When the war came on, while increasing the wages of their employees as much as they were compelled to, these patriotic, liberty-loving folks—the Steel Corporation—quadrupled its net income out of the war necessities of the world. The Steel Corporation is typical. What it did was done by every other big manufacturing plant in the United States. They say that a part of their prosperity trickles down upon the people and makes us all prosperous. Happy thought!

There seems to be a paradox involved in almost any view that can be taken of our international trade if we admit two facts which seem absolutely true. First, that America produces a great surplus of nearly all commodities of common consumption; and, second, that Europe owes us $10,000,000,000, the interest on which she must somehow pay us. The first statement seems to demand that we export more than we import; the second that we import more than we export. What is the solution? It is very sure that tariff restrictions on the part of European countries and America calculated to exclude each other's products will give no solution, but would aggravate the situation. It is very certain that if we exclude their products they can not take ours, even if they pass no restrictive laws; and it seems to me equally certain that in that case they can not pay us what they owe us in cash and will not try to pay us in any other way. They will of necessity trade among themselves, and if they are wise, by liberal trade laws inter se, make more progress than we, shut within our own borders. They will import our capital, our machinery, our inventions, our business methods, through our own capitalists, but nothing else.

Germany will not import our steel rails or our locomotives, but the United States Steel Corporation will simply organize a branch, or possibly its biggest steel plant, somewhere in Germany. If we want to see our greatest manufacturing plants stand still or shrink and our international trade in manufactures leave us, prohibitory tariff is the means to that end. If we stop trade with Europe, Japan, and China can we retain our trade with South and Central America? Certainly not, if we can not compete with Europe in supplying their needs. What, then, is the solution of our paradox? I may be blind; but I believe we want to keep the greater part of our capital and productive enterprise here in America and make America the distributing center for the products of American capital, skill, and labor. That we would rather see American-made products go all over the world than see American producers go all over the world. We have reached the parting of the ways and must choose between these two plans. If we choose the first we will have here the biggest organized industrial plants in the world, and these will grow and prosper as the whole world grows and prospers. Have I made myself clear? With prohibitory tariff we send our capital and industry abroad. With competitive tariff we send our products abroad and receive foreign products, and acquire foreign property in payment. In that case it may be, I think will surely be, that for many years America will have more and more owing to her; but even twice $10,000,000,000 is not an overwhelming debt for the whole world to owe us provided it is owed by the peoples and not by their governments. If government debts can be converted into industrial obligations, then the situation becomes similar to that which existed here before the war, when every community in America was a debtor to some loan company in Europe. We found it no harder to pay 5 per cent interest to a British or Scottish or German loan company than it was to pay the same or higher interest to an American loan company. Individual borrowers sought only the cheapest money. It may well be that the interest rate here, when we must become the great money and lending center, will be lower than in Europe. It ought to be. I do not believe we must necessarily continue indefinitely increasing the debt of the world to us, but we must do so, if we are wise, for a long, long time. Europe is to be rebuilt. It will take capital.

Somebody is going to trade with China; that is, exchange goods with China. England has traded profitably for centuries with East India. The trade with China, like that with India, is a field for the enterprise and investment of American capital. It ought to contribute to American expansion of trade. It will not if we exclude its products. European and Asiatic Russia is the new world of to-day. It awaits development. Much of Asia will call for the pioneer spirit that opened the wilds of North America. These pioneers will be financed from somewhere. While building up the new world they must borrow, as we have been doing for centuries. Now, we or somebody must lend, and they must pay interest, and pay it in products. We talk of a consortium to finance China. I have not much hope in that, but furnishing capital and skill to develop its resources through investment is different. South America, Central America, Africa, Europe, Asia, all call for our skill and capital in their building and their rebuilding and development. We are clamoring for the open door in all these countries, and yet the tariff bill adopted by the House is a closed-door policy for the United States. The only wise policy for us to-day is one under which we shall invite and not prohibit competition. Our tariffs must permit real competition. They will then become a source of great revenue and not just a means for levying great tribute on the consuming public by the favored few. We must learn to accustom ourselves to seeing the manufactures as well as the raw materials of foreign countries for sale in our markets. A calico dress, a winter suit of clothes, made of European cloth must not be an unheard-of thing in America. Not the rich only but the masses must have the benefit of real competition. Under this policy we might have to discontinue the production of commodities we can not produce in competition because we are not adapted to their production, but in the commodities which from soil, climate, and abundance of raw material we can produce with economy we ought to control the markets of the world, because we would produce them in greater quantities and by the most advanced and improved methods and machinery and would have the advantage of the greatest consuming market at our doors. There are not lacking those who would have had us retain Cuba or who would have us now retain the Philippines and take over Mexico. If we did so, we would have to give them free trade with us. We would adapt ourselves to it, and we would industrially profit by it. The valid objection to incorporating these countries into the United States is racial, not industrial.

We would gladly have Canada become a State or several States in our Union. Yet guided by shortsighted selfishness the people on both sides of the imaginary line that separates them rejected the reciprocity treaty negotiated by President Taft. If an international trade war is to be conducted by international cutthroat laws as an aftermath of the great World War, we have yet to learn its bitterest lessons.

This seems to me to be a time for real statesmen and not for time-serving petty politicians, ready to crook the pregnant hinges of the knee that thrift may follow fawning.

Now, my colleagues, let me repeat, what is the condition in this year of 1921? We do not owe $8,000,000,000 to Europe, but, on the contrary, $15,000,000,000 is owing to us, perhaps, and the interest must be paid to us on that instead of interest being paid by us. What else? We have built a great merchant marine, with perhaps $3,000,000,000 of our money, amounting approximately, or will amount in 1922, to something like 20,000,000 tons dead weight, and we propose to put it on the ocean to transport our commodities. In 1914 it was currently talked here that we were paying $300,000,000 a year in freights to the owners of foreign ships for the goods we sent abroad and the goods we brought back. This was another great item in debit account to the foreigners, which we then paid with the surplus products of our farm and factory.

Now, we propose to do at least our share of that overseas carrying and take off $100,000,000 of what we formerly paid to foreigners by sending our goods abroad and bringing our imports back, if we have any, in our own bottoms. Now figure it up, gentlemen. The difference is to-day that Europe must pay us perhaps a billion dollars a year or more than that. A billion dollars will hardly cover the interest she owes us. How is she going to do it? How can she do it but by selling us her goods? Gentlemen, trade is reciprocal; that is mutual. Trade every year must have a balanced account. You can not trade with any nation on earth unless you close your account somehow, and what Europe buys from us she must pay for in cash, or in goods, or in the execution of her indebtedness obligations in the form of notes, bonds, or something else. Is not that true? If her credit is exhausted, if her obligations are unacceptable, what then?

My countrymen, thinking of all this, does it not look to you that it is just about time to revise your views and let something come in from abroad to help pay these things that must be paid? I know you will say, "We will not stop imports." You say you do not want to exclude everything, but some one representing every individual item of product that is made by any individual citizen of the United States comes before your Committee on Ways and Means and asks for a tariff high enough to exclude all competition, and they get it. I want to know if the world is not entitled to a revision of its scheme of relationship? Is it not entitled to have us pull down the bars to some extent, to have France and Germany pull down the bars to some extent and let the world trade with the world? Oh, the inconsistency! We are here building a wall so high as to keep out everything that might come in for the relief of our people from exorbitant prices. We have been building up for a century monopolistic millionaires, and we propose to build the wall still higher; to exclude competition still more in order to give the better opportunity for people to make their profits, and yet we spend hundreds of millions of dollars on our ports and harbors and on our merchant shipping in order to encourage and increase our foreign trade. Of what use are these facilities if we destroy our foreign trade? How are we going to send anything abroad? I am talking about tariff restrictions now. How are we going to market anything abroad unless we take something back?

Oh, you say, "We will make reciprocal treaties." Gentlemen, you are weaving a web of such tangled threads that no statesmanship on earth can ever administer your laws wisely or effectively. As nearly as I can make you out you contend that you are going to still permit some little things to come in, some things that do not compete with our home products. And that is all. What will be done with our corn? You are going to put a duty on that, and yet you hope to export millions of bushels of it and sell it in competition with the world. May we import wheat? No; you are going to put a duty on that. May we import wool? You are going to put a duty on that. Yes; we will import raw wool, but the tariff on woolens is going to raise prices so high the poor man can not use them. What about steel products? You do not expect to import any. You are putting a duty back on steel products, some of which were formerly free. Yet Mr. Carnegie has testified that the steel works of the United States can undersell any other steel manufacturer. But still you put the duty there. In absurd conflict with all this you are trying to organize a billion-dollar corporation to help finance agricultural exports and other exports.

But, gentlemen, I want to discuss another feature of this matter. What about your duties? How have you laid them, and what is the effect of them? I will say this: That every tariff bill that has ever been passed by the Republican Party—and to some extent the same applies to the Democratic Party—permits the manufacturer to protect himself against protection. How? By your rebates and your compensatory duties. I have not got them before me now. I thought I would read them in order to discuss this question, but I would not have time to read them anyhow, in the brief time I have. I shall discuss them in my extended remarks. In substance the present drawback law provides that whenever a commodity comes into this country and is manufactured by the importer into something and sent abroad, the importer, when he exports the product of it, will go to the Treasury and draw back 99 per cent of all the tax he paid.

That is the law to-day. It allows the manufacturer to import free of duty practically all the raw material he wants.

Now let us see how it works in the case of wheat. You levy a duty, we will say, of 35 cents a bushel on wheat. Who imports wheat into this country? The millman. The millman at Minneapolis will import 100,000 bushels of wheat, we will say, or 1,000,000 bushels of wheat; but the record shows that there is more wheat or more flour exported from the United States than there is wheat imported. The millman exports it. The millman, when he exports the 100,000 bushels of wheat or the 1,000,000 bushels of wheat that he has imported, when he exports it in the form of flour, draws back 99 per cent of the duty he pays on the wheat which he imported.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. That probably accounts for the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] in his speech the other day, in which he stated that wheat had declined in price and he was wondering why the price of flour still remains so high.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Flour is protected.

Mr. BLACK. That fortifies the argument we have always made, that the producer gets no benefit from the duty, but the manufacturer adds it to the price of the flour.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. He can add it to the price of his flour and then draw it back from the Treasury. When he imports 100,000 bushels of wheat he pays the duty, but after he gets his drawback he leaves only 1 per cent of the duty in the Treasury, and that is the amount of protection given to the wheat farmer. The manufacturer is preparing to do even better than that by establishing bonded warehouses in which to keep his imports without paying any tax at all.

Now, that is not all. Take the question of oil that enters into this controversy now. Who will import oil if you put a duty on oil?

My people at home are sending me telegrams urging me to vote for a duty on oil. I am not going to do it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If there were no other reason, this one reason would be sufficient: The Standard Oil Co. has its ships carrying cargoes of oil to all the markets of the world. I saw them in Shanghai. You will see them in Japan. You will see them in every market of the world—the Standard Oil ships. They can pay the duty on all the oil they want to import into the United States from Mexico, and then draw it back with the other hand when they export millions and billions of barrels that they send abroad; and the little independent who thinks he is protected by the duty will find that the Standard can beat his price down by importing oil from Mexico, if it wants to, knowing that its oil ship would go out to-morrow to some port of the world and that it would get a refund of the tax it pays.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And in the meantime the importer would probably put up the price of domestic gasoline and charge it to the tariff duty?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I have no doubt of it, because when a tariff is put on crude oil a compensatory tariff will be put on gasoline, and that will enable him to raise the price of gasoline here.

Gentlemen, it is difficult now to find the schedule of a duty on raw material that is not backed up by a compensatory duty to the maker of the finished product, so that the manufacturer can pass it on to the consumer here, and every duty paid by the manufacturer on his raw material is refunded when he sends his manufactured product abroad, by reason of his drawback. Perhaps there is one merit in the drawback. It may give some cargo for our ships coming back home, since the manufacturer can afford to pay any duty when he knows he is going to get it back. When matured and perfected, the Republican tariff system will amount to free trade for the manufacturer and high tariff for nearly everybody else. He will get his raw material at the foreign price free of duty, and sell his finished product at the foreign price plus the duty. It is a system of great beauty for the manufacturer, and he blandly invites the grain grower and the cotton grower to get inside—"Will you come into my parlor? said the spider to the fly."

There are so many mysteries and iniquities in a highly protective tariff under our existing industrial system, and the strong organization of manufacturing capital that I could not discuss a tithe of them if I had two hours instead of half an hour at my disposal, but I shall try to explain some of them in my extended remarks.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman know that the drawback applies only when the finished product is sent abroad?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Certainly, I know that and have been stating just that. I had that same question up with a gentleman the other day and I read him the law, and it showed that when wheat was imported and converted into flour, if the major part of that wheat was put into the product that was exported, he got as drawback the whole tax paid by him.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; the gentleman is in error.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I put it in my speech at that time.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman is in error.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I know I am right. I know he gets his drawback.

Mr. FORDNEY. He gets the drawback only on any raw material imported when he converts it into the finished product by American labor and exports the finished product.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, no.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Oh, yes, it is.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I am sure I am right, but I am going to argue the matter on the basis of his getting the drawback only on the amount that is converted into flour. What per cent is that?

Mr. FORDNEY. Three-fourths of the total product of the wheat, but that is more than three-fourths of its total value, because the flour is worth more than the by-product.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Well, say 90 per cent, then.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Then he gets back 90 per cent of the duty he paid on his wheat?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. And leaves in the Treasury 10 per cent?

Mr. FORDNEY. Provided the by-product is left in this country. If he exports the by-product, he gets it all back except 1 per cent.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman and I agree entirely that if he exports it all he gets 99 per cent, and if he exports only 90 per cent of it, as he does in the case of flour, he only gets 90 per cent of 99 per cent.

Mr. FORDNEY. I did not understand the gentleman's statement. The gentleman and I agree on that.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. We do agree, and when we agree we reach the conclusion that the raw-material man gets no real protection from the tax, while the finished-product man gets a protection in the guise of compensatory duty on the product of his skill and industry if he sells it here and a drawback if he ships it abroad. The millman bears no burden in either case, while the domestic consumer does.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me see if I understand the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Where a man converts wheat into flour, you give him a compensatory duty, do you not?

Mr. FORDNEY. Not unless he exports it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I am talking now about what he does not export. On that he gets a compensatory duty. If he buys wheat here, he beats down the price of the home wheat to equal the price of the wheat that he imports from Winnipeg. Because he is not going to really pay any duty on the wheat that he imports from Winnipeg because he is going to export the flour which is the product of that wheat. He exports more flour than he imports wheat, and that entitles him to his drawback. Last year our imports of wheat were 35,000,000 bushels and the same year our exports of wheat and flour were 218,000,000 bushels. Most of this was flour. There is never any trouble in the world for the millman who imports wheat and pays duty on it to show that he has exported more flour than he imported wheat, and so he gets his drawback, we will say, on 90 per cent of it, and when he exports all the product, then he gets back 99 per cent of the duty he paid, and the duty which he is charged on the wheat he has imported has not done the American farmer any good, because the millman who imports wheat does not have to pay any duty, or only a very small percentage, because he gets it back in the drawback.

Mr. FORDNEY. That applies only to that portion which is exported, and the object of the drawback is to allow him to import raw material and give American labor and capital an opportunity to operate on it and then export it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Exactly; and he exports it all. He can easily show that he exports more than he imports. Nevertheless, because of the nominal duty he pays on wheat, he is given the compensatory duty on flour, and that enables him to charge the American consumer a higher price for flour.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I wish I could take a little more time.

Mr. GARNER. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman, but I have 24 hours' requests for speeches in general debate.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I do not ask any more time. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. I make that statement now so that the membership of the House can understand it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I will begin my extension by quoting the exact words of the existing drawback law. Those who read may say who was right in the colloquy between the gentleman from Michigan and myself. Here is the law:

> If the principal product (of an imported commodity) is exported, then, on the exportation thereof, there shall be refunded as drawback the whole of the duty paid on the imported material used in the production of both the principal and the by-product less 1 per cent.

This law applies to every bushel of imported wheat when the flour from it is exported. It applies also to the farmers' emergency tariff approved May 27, 1921, and to be extended by this session of Congress until the general tariff bill is passed, whenever that may be. It makes that so-called emergency law a fraud as to the wheat grower but a very vital thing as to the miller, who is given under it a compensatory duty against the imaginary tax which he is supposed to pay but does not pay on the wheat he imports.

Under this emergency tariff bill the miller imports all the wheat he wants, paying the duty on it, and then gets back 99 per cent of the duty when he exports a quantity of flour equal to the flour content of the wheat imported. There will be left then to protect the wheat grower 1 per cent of the 35 cents duty, or 0.0035 cent per bushel. It is amazing how the tariff doctors and the millmen fool the wheat growers and their representatives here into believing that they were being given a protective duty of 35 cents per bushel on imported wheat. If that had been true, however, it would not have benefited them, as I will show later. But if I do not succeed in satisfying the wheat grower that a real duty of 35 cents would not benefit him, he will agree with me that when the tariff by the millers' drawback is reduced to about one-third of a cent per bushel it becomes a joke. By calling attention to this in my brief speech and colloquy with Mr. FORDNEY in the House on April 14, I think I am responsible for somewhat clarifying the vision of the wheat grower. He has demanded and secured a change of the drawback provision in the pending bill. Under this bill "where two or more products result from the manipulation of imported material the drawback shall be distributed to the several products in accordance with their relative values at the time of separation; where, however, no duty is assessable upon the importation of a by-product then upon the exportation of the principal product there shall be refunded the drawback accruing to the whole of the imported material." So that under this bill the miller will not get the full drawback unless he exports both the flour and all the products. This will cause him to export the feed or raise its price to the dairy and cattle men.

If he exports the flour only, since Mr. FORDNEY says that constitutes 90 per cent of the total value of the wheat, he will get a drawback of only 90 per cent of the duty paid, and will, therefore, under this bill, which puts a duty of 25 cents a bushel, leave about 2½ cents a bushel in the Treasury and will certainly get that back from the dairyman since feedstuffs are in very great demand here. I hardly think the wheat grower will be fascinated by that, even though he may be fooled into believing that it is 2½ cents real protection for him, especially when he sees the millman's flour protected by 50 cents per 100 pounds and his feedstuffs protected likewise and knows that under this protection the well-organized and wealthy millers can take the full benefit and do make him and all the rest of us pay more for flour and feedstuffs than is paid anywhere else in the world. It seems strange to me that so little is said in tariff debates about the drawback and compensatory duty provisions of all tariff bills. I am persuaded that most of the producers of raw material have never heard of them until lately. Just lately they have had their eyes slightly opened to the mysteries of the compensatory duty, but the beauties of the drawback are still to be revealed to them.

But, gentlemen, I think I can show the wheat grower that he can not possibly receive any benefit from any duty on wheat so long as we are great exporters of wheat and wheat products. I shall present some tables. Please bear in mind while studying them that there was a duty of 25 cents per bushel on wheat from 1906 to 1913, inclusive, and 10 cents per bushel from 1913 to April, 1917, and after that it was duty free. Bear in mind, also, that an article whose price is raised by the tariff will be higher here than in Liverpool.

From the Tariff Commission's "Tariff Information, Series 20," page 50, I give the following:

It appears that during the 19 years shown both the United States and Canada exported great quantities of wheat and flour. The United States have been specially heavy exporters of flour.

In the same years both Canada and the United States have imported wheat as shown in Table 16 of the same series, page 57 here given:

Canada is a greater exporter and smaller importer of wheat in proportion to population because she is a greater grower and has smaller milling facilities in proportion to population than the United States. Our millers are very much interested in increasing our imports of wheat in order to give them more wheat to grind, and if we can import wheat and give them this grinding without detriment to the wheat grower or the American people at large, we ought to do it. But this can only be done by putting wheat and flour both on the free list, as they ought to be, rather than putting them both on the dutiable list and thereby enabling the miller to raise the price of his products.

Now, from the same series, No. 20, pages 61 and 65, I give the following table and price chart:

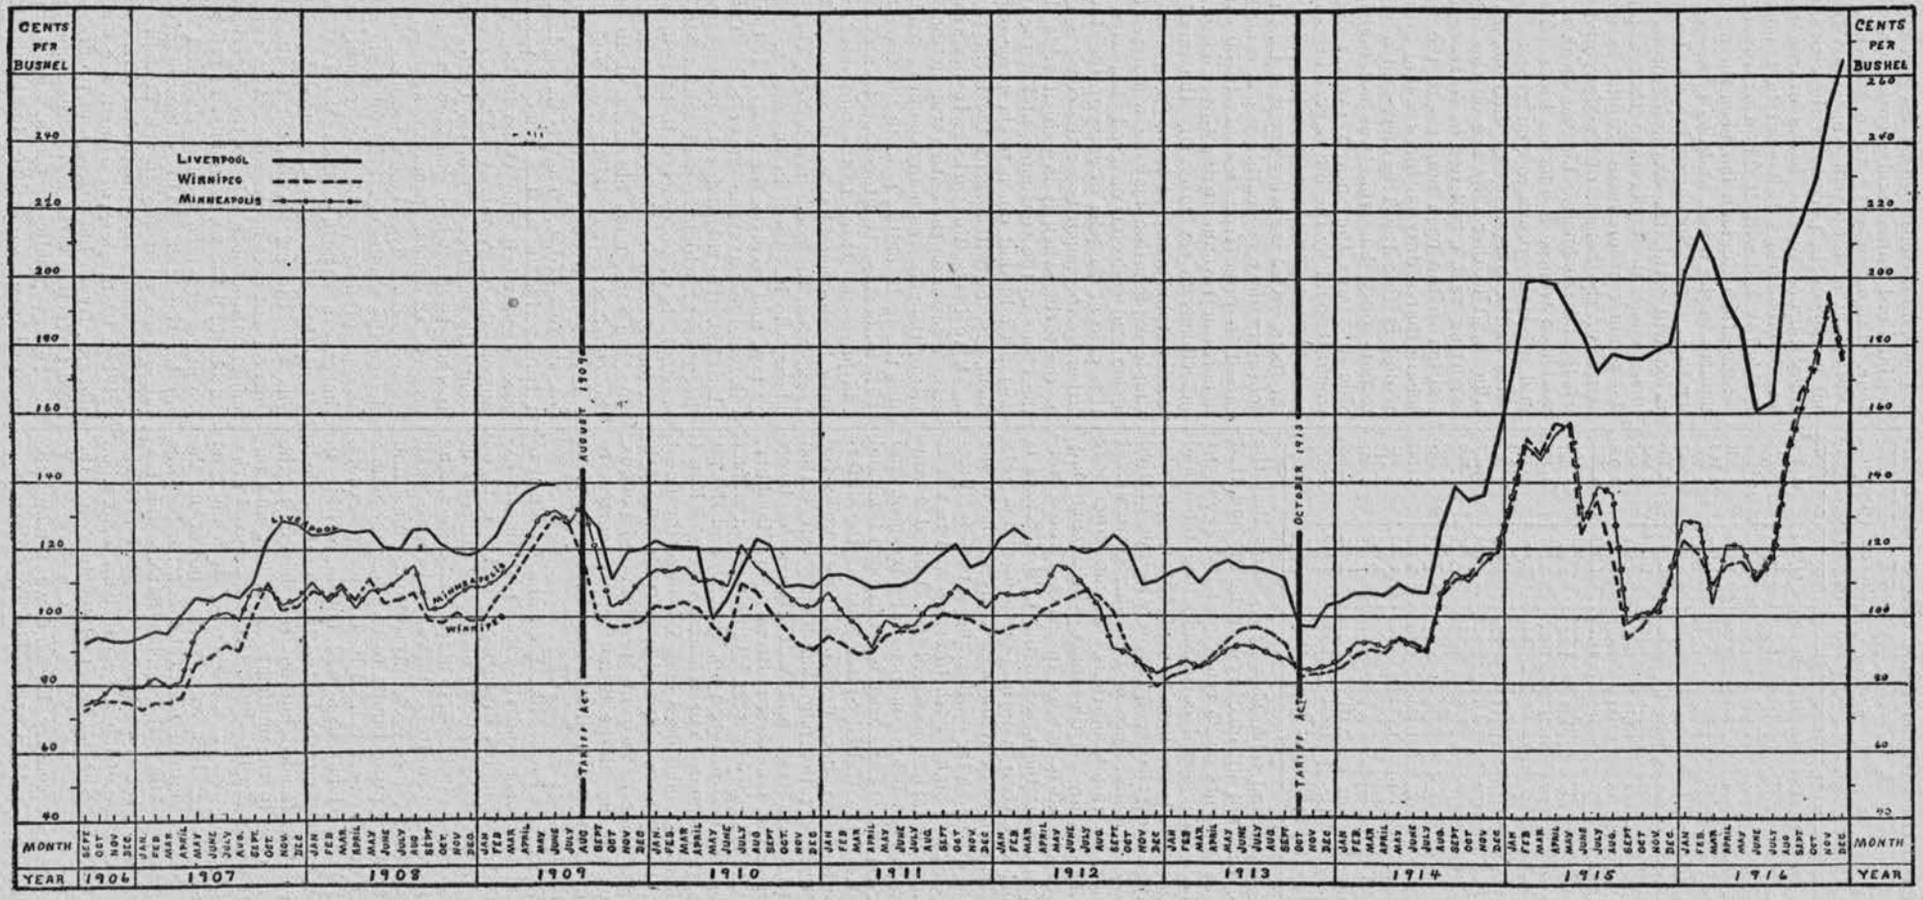
Whatever else the chart and table show, they show that the price of wheat here was not affected by our tariff, and that whether the duty was 10 cents or 25 cents, and it was one or the other during the whole period covered by the table and chart, its price was always lower here than in Liverpool. The commission states that the price comparison was not carried beyond 1916 because of the influence of the war, Government price fixing, and abnormal trade conditions. I quote from page 62: "The outstanding feature of the chart is that not only Winnipeg but Minneapolis also follows in general the Liverpool prices." I will add that the price in the United States is consistently a shade lower than it is in Liverpool and a very slight shade higher than it is in Winnipeg. This seems to me to be natural, because of the better milling and export facilities of the United States. The point I wish to stress and repeat is that notwithstanding our tariff on wheat the United States wheat price has always been below the price at Liverpool, and the difference about represents the cost of transportation and handling shipments from the United States, just as the difference between the cotton price here and in Europe marks the reasonable cost of transportation and handling. Our cotton and our wheat has always been and will always be lower here than in Liverpool or London or Bremen or Hamburg. It seems to me that this price chart and table present a fact which all the theories in the world can not change, and if that be true, what can a tariff do for our wheat growers? But I will tell you what it can do and does do. We have the finest and biggest flour mills in the world, and a duty on wheat is followed by a duty on flour of 50 cents per hundred pounds, and that enables our millman, if he is not tender-hearted, to charge the American consumer a dollar a barrel more for flour than he does the foreigner.

It may be that the wheat grower, like Ephriam, is joined to his idols and is blind to reason and the clear teaching of experience, and so will insist on his illusory protective duty on wheat, and in order to get it joins hosts of greedy interests of all kinds of organized capital, particularly manufacturing capital, in giving them compensatory duties, drawbacks, and prohibitory tariffs generally, since every protectionist must and does unite with every other protectionist to swallow the whole scheme. But I trust our farmers generally, our wage earners, our merchants, and professional men will not be willing to pay a dollar more per barrel than the rest of the world for their flour in order to give this fancied but not real benefit to the wheat grower and to give to the millman an unjust and unreasonable profit. It would not be so bad if the increased price of flour were all that followed in the wake of this duty on wheat, but the wheat grower is a vast voting power in the land; he is perhaps the determining political factor; if he joins the Steel Trust, the copper kings, the lumber barons, the textile manufacturers, and all the cormorant horde that pick the bones of the poor in the name of labor, he will help to fix upon us a system of slavery for the masses and mastery for the favored few.



In the middle of the last century England was among the highest protective countries in the world. The Tory Party was in power and controlled by the rich landlords. The miller and the landlord united and secured a heavy tariff on wheat and flour. Enough wheat was not grown to feed the British people. Every cent of the tariff was added to the price of bread. It put money in the pockets of the rich landlord and miller and a heavy burden on the backs of the poor. Some time in the forties bread riots broke out in London and forced the repeal of this tax and with it the overthrow of the protective policy.

Since then England has been the nearest to free trade of any country in the world, and has prospered beyond any other country in Europe. Sooner or later, if nothing else can do it, revolution will break the chains of protection when the great majority comes to understand that a high protective tariff for the product of organized capital is nothing but a tax on the many for the benefit of the few, and that it is a breeder of trusts and monopoly. Let me speak of a Texas product. Our cattlemen wanted a duty on hides. The leather and shoe men said all right, provided you give us both a drawback on exports and a compensatory duty on leather and leather goods. Hides and leather now are on the free list, and we are now exporting vast quantities of leather goods in successful competition in the open markets of the world. It was shown in debate that a duty on hides would bring a good many millions of dollars into the Treasury, and might therefore be called a revenue duty, but what was not told by the advocates of the hide duty was that nearly every dollar of the duty collected would be paid by the big packer or tanner importers, and paid back to them on the exportation of their leather and leather products. Also we were not told that under the proposed compensatory duty on leather goods every pair of shoes would be raised in price from 8 cents to 50 cents with practically no imports or revenue to the Government. In this day it may be superfluous to try to clarify the tariff subject, but I am persuaded that even yet many people do not understand it. A simple explanation may be worth while. The tariff is a tax levied and collected on goods imported into the United States. It is paid at the port of entry to the Government customs officer either by the importer or the consignee. Whatever the amount of the tariff, when it is paid it adds that much to the cost of the goods to the consignee, and if the consignee be a merchant he must add that much to the price of the goods when he sells them, else he will lose by the tariff whatever he lacks of adding it to his selling price. In practice the consignee tries to make a profit on the entire transaction. He properly counts the cost of the goods as being the price paid by him to the foreigner plus the tariff or tax paid to the Government.

He adds these two together, then adds his profit on the whole and passes all three to the purchaser to whom he sells. If he buys in Bremen $100 worth of goods to be delivered at New York, when the goods reach New York he goes to the customs officer who has them in custody, pays whatever tariff is fixed by law, and receives the goods. If the tariff is 50 per cent ad valorem, he pays the officer $50. The goods have then cost him $150. He then adds his profit—say 10 per cent—and fixes the price at which he will sell at $165. The tax, be it great or small, is of no concern to him, since he passes it on to his customer, who is the retail merchant. The retail merchant pays the $165, adds his profit of 10 per cent, and sells it to the consumer—that is, to you and me—for $181.50. When you or I have bought these goods the $50 tax or tariff has cost us just $60.50. That is the ordinary everyday working of a transaction in tariff. That is what the tariff is. Its purpose, declared in the Constitution, was to raise revenue to support the Government. The $50 paid to the customs officer went into the Treasury of the United States, but that tariff has another effect, which has now become its chief purpose. It protects the home producer against the foreign producer of these goods. The home producer of the same goods may charge the wholesaler $150 for them and yet compete with the foreign producer, who receives only a hundred dollars. By charging a little less than $150, say $140, he can sell nearly all of that kind of goods used by the American people. In this way the price is raised to the home consumer and the Government gets no revenue. As a matter of fact, the American manufacturer does sell to the American consumer about nine-tenths of all the goods he buys at prices very much greater than the prices at which the manufacturer could and would sell them but for the tariff. This enhanced price to the American consumer puts no money in the Treasury of the Government, but does put money into the pocket of the manufacturer.

When by the levy of a tariff the manufacturer is enabled to add greatly to his prices and profits, such a tariff is called a high protective tariff and is the same thing as a bounty paid by the general public to the manufacturer. Under rates of tax imposed on many articles in the pending bill all importations will cease, so that the public will pay a vast bounty to the protected few and the Treasury will receive scarcely a dollar. It is argued that when by the tariff foreign goods are excluded, then domestic competition operates and lowers the price of the domestic product even below the foreign level. That might be, but in fact never is true in this day as to manufactured goods, because great capital works through combination or monopoly successfully to milk the great American public to the last dollar. It supplies home demand at the highest price the trade will bear, and if they have a surplus they sell it abroad frequently at prices below their foreign competitors. They make the home buyer pay enough to carry any lack of profit on their foreign sales. In this way our manufacturers carry their surplus to foreign markets. It is the shame of the protective system that any American can buy American-made goods cheaper abroad than at home. By selling cheaper abroad than at home or by simply closing down his factory and turning off his labor the American manufacturer is able to hold his domestic prices up. The Steel Trust to-day has discharged 70 per cent of its labor but has reduced its prices less than any other producer in America. Of course the tariff beneficiary claims that he wants a high tariff for the benefit of his workingmen in order to give him high wages. He does not tell his employee that under this high tariff he holds the American market closed against all the world, and that when he chooses he can close down his factory and discharge his employees, and that if labor is not cheap enough for him here he can and does take his capital and machinery abroad and make his goods there.

The pending tax measure I believe exempts capital so invested from taxation here. For a long time the manufacturer while shedding tears over his poor employee here was allowed a free hand to import all the foreign labor he desired, and he did it to such an extent that millions of laborers in the manufacturing districts are foreigners who can not speak our language and know nothing of our institutions. Our anti-immigration laws have impeded the tide of foreign labor but the manufacturer is resourceful. No law prevents his carrying his capital abroad wherever he can find the cheapest labor, and I am going to make a prediction now that when Republican restricted legislation has succeeded in isolating our country by practically forbidding all importations of foreign commerce you will find our American capitalists and manufacturers spreading out, not by sending American-made goods all over the world but by sending American capital and engaging in manufacturing all over the world. The mysteries and difficulty of understanding the operation of the protective tariff are so numerous I can not name them. There is one special product of interest to Texas people I want specially to discuss. Why is it that in normal times, our annual production of wool being about half our annual consumption, a duty of 11 cents per pound did not raise the price of raw wool perceptibly? The reason is the woolen manufacturers are organized and financially powerful, while the sheepmen are not. When this duty was on wool the manufacturers bought all the wool in Liverpool needed to supplement the home production. On this they paid the duty. If they paid 22 cents in Liverpool the 11-cent duty added made the foreign wool cost them 33 cents per pound. You can imagine the Texas wool grower in Boston offering his clip for the year at 33 cents per pound, that being the foreign price plus the tariff. You can imagine that, but you never heard of him getting it.

The Boston millman simply said I will give you Liverpool price, 22 cents per pound, and no more, and if you will not take that you will ship it to Liverpool and get the same price for it there. For many years prior to the passage of the Underwood tariff putting wool on the free list there was very little difference in the price of wool at Boston and Liverpool. Sheepmen were told all over the United States that the Underwood bill by removing the tariff would reduce the price of their unwashed wool 11 cents a pound, but it did not do it. It did not reduce the price they got at all. That bill passed October 3, 1913, and here is a table furnished me by the Department of Agriculture in a letter dated July 23, 1921, showing Boston wool prices from 1910 to 1920, inclusive, The Texas prices are given on scoured wool so that to make the comparison for unwashed wool you will have to look at the Ohio, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania quotations. This table shows that wool passed from the dutiable to the free list with almost no change in the Boston prices. That is the fact and the reason for it I have attempted to give. There are those who believe, and not without reason, that with wool on the free list domestic wool would sell for a higher price in Boston than it will with a duty on it for the reason that with free wool our woolen mills would be tempted to enlarge their plants, to operate them more continuously, and thus increase the demand for raw wool. I simply present the table I have referred to and let it speak for itself.

While I think I have shown that the duty on unwashed wool has not benefited the grower, please remember it serves as a pretext for a vastly increased duty on woolen goods and so added enormously to the price paid for woolen clothing in the country.

There is no patriotism, no altruism, no love of labor in protection. There is only selfishness. In relation to it there are two classes—those who receive benefits and those who bear burdens. You can not give something to one man without taking it from some other man. Unfortunately, men will vote on the question as they think they are selfishly interested. Those who produce a surplus beyond the home demand are against it because the price of their surplus sold abroad fixes the price in the home market also, unless they are organized and strong enough to prevent competition among themselves and if need be to stop production and arbitrarily fix the price at home. In that case they are even stronger protectionists than those whose product is less than the home demand because having a monopoly of the home market they can raise their price here in order to dump their surplus on the foreign market at low prices and yet receive an average that enriches them, all at the expense of the home consumer. All those who by operation of the tariff can raise the price of their products to their fellow countrymen are for protection. Those who can really do this are the mine owners, the timber owners, the manufacturers, a few highly organized fruit growers, and practically no others, yet they have so befuddled and beclouded the minds of the people that perhaps a majority of them actually think that we as a Nation can by taxing ourselves enrich ourselves as a whole. The real beneficiaries of the high tariff are not 10 per cent of the American people. If by the tariff we gave something to every man, we could only do it by taking something from every man. If every man is enabled to take a dollar or a hundred dollars from his neighbor's pocket, no man in the end would be richer or poorer; but if every one-hundredth man is privileged to take a hundred dollars from the remaining ninety-nine, that man would get rich. That is the tariff.

Protectionists point to American prosperity and claim it is the result of protection. I deny it. I ask if protection enriches a nation, why has it not enriched Spain, Italy, Turkey, and Japan, which are among the highest protected and poorest countries of the world? I assert that we are the richest country in the world, because we have the greatest natural resources; we produce more, therefore we have more than any people in the world. We are the most industrious, intelligent, ingenious, and capable people in the world. Our 48 States, with 110,000,000 inhabitants, are the greatest aggregation of industrious, intelligent people that ever had absolute free trade between them, thereby stimulating and advancing all their interests, and up to now, notwithstanding our obstructive and restrictive laws, we have been one of the greatest international traders in the world. Our cotton, our grain, our meat products, our mineral products, and our manufactures have gone all over the world, and somehow up to now we have managed to bring something back in exchange. If a shortsighted policy, prompted by greed, shall lead us now to cut off trade and fair exchange with the world; if other nations shall follow our restrictive policy, as many of them seem inclined to do, the condition of the whole world will be changed. Vessels laden with rich argosies will no longer traverse the seas. Our manufacturing cities will not only cease to grow but begin to decay. Our surplus grain and cotton must rot in the fields. The wharves at our seaport towns will be no longer piled high with goods. The dull calm of stagnation will settle down. Every merchant ship will simply be "a painted ship upon a painted ocean." Carried to its logical end, protection precludes all trade save of the most meager kind between every little and big State. With interchange of commodities ending, little interchange of other kinds will continue. Progress will cease. There will be no interchange of ideas; no rivalries among the peoples; there will be national isolation; there will be peace at last—peace on earth but the peace of death.

Mr. SCOTT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, no protective tariff law has ever received the unanimous approval of the advocates of the principle of protection. No tariff law for revenue only has ever had the unqualified indorsement of all the proponents of the policy of tariff for revenue only. Thus it can be seen that tariff legislation is perhaps the most complicated and debatable subject that receives the consideration of the American Congress.

The Fordney-McCumber tariff bill is by no means perfect. Tariff laws are never perfect. Rapidly changing industrial and economic conditions are constantly making tariff revision necessary. It was for this reason that the proposed tariff law contains the provisions empowering the President, upon the recommendation of the Tariff Commission, to raise and lower rates as the interest of the country may demand. It is urged by certain critics that this power is extraordinary in effect, and can be easily misappropriated. In reply to this contention it should be observed that the President can only make such changes in tariff rates which have been recommended by the Tariff Commission, which is composed of a body of tariff experts. Notwithstanding this logical and practical arrangement, criticism of this system may nevertheless be expected. Mr. Speaker, criticism of legislation and legislators might properly be classed under two distinct heads: First, criticism in the interest of public good; second, criticism in the interest of public office. Criticism to promote public welfare is indeed most commendable and should be generously encouraged, but criticism, polluted with misrepresentations and tainted with selfishness, is little short of crime, and deserves the condemnation of a truth-seeking public. Perhaps at no time during all history as since the World War have economical and industrial conditions been so uncertain and disturbing. Radical and constant fluctuation of foreign exchanges and currencies have naturally been reflected in the markets of our country, since these countries are patrons of our industries, both farm and factory. A merchant whose agricultural customers are visited by drought shares in loss of sales in proportion to his agricultural customer's loss in production. The same principle applies as between nations, which have commercial contact, when visited by misfortune, causing economical depressions.

Europe has long since been our customer, or, in other words, our market for our surplus products. The World War left her back bent with billions of indebtedness; her purchasing power materially reduced; and her currency and exchange fluctuations so varying as to alarm even the most optimistic financier, thereby making her markets apprehensive and undependable. While Europe's most capable financiers have been struggling to stabilize their national economic systems and have made gratifying progress, yet it is but plausible to admit that Europe's chaotic financial status, as a result of the World War, has significantly affected the industrial and economical equilibrium of our country as well. Laboring under these abnormal and deplorable speculative conditions, the thoughtful and considerate can appreciate the difficulties encountered in drafting a tariff bill which would conserve the legitimate interests of the agricultural and industrial affairs of this country, and at the same time regard with propriety the commercial equities of foreign countries. Errors doubtless have been made and injustices may result in some instances. These can and will, I hope, be amended immediately upon the discovery of such existence.

Personally, I shall welcome the time when the tariff question may be divorced from politics and the power of imposing and revising tariff duties on imports shall be vested in a tariff commission operated by the practical application of the principle of protection of our national industries. However, permit me to say that I would not yield that power to a commission not in accord with the principle of protection.

Mr. Speaker, at the expiration of the present administration this great Government will have endured 136 years. One hundred and four years of that period the party in power has been the high or protective tariff party; the remaining 32 years has seen the low-tariff or free-trade party in power. Ninety per cent of our periods of depressions have occurred during the low-tariff or free-trade administrations. Thomas Jefferson, a Democrat, a protectionist, embargoed shipments of foreign goods during his administration that the American laborer and manufacturer might be protected. I am sure it will be of interest to the country to know that during the consideration of the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill by the Senate that every Democratic Senator, save Senator OWEN, of Oklahoma, voted for a tariff on some article or product. A close inspection of the record reveals that the article or product which received the respective Senators' approval as dutiable was either produced or manufactured in the State which he had the honor to represent. This reflects back-home activities, and few there be who can successfully resist the appeal for protection. So it may well be said that every Democratic Senator, except one, not only believes in but actually supported the principle of protection.

Those of our Presidents who have favored low tariffs were Martin Van Buren, James K. Polk, Franklin Pierce, Grover Cleveland, and Woodrow Wilson; all of our other 24 Presidents have been protectionists. Many of us recall vividly but unpleasantly the horrible depression that paralyzed every industry, both farm and factory, under Cleveland's low-tariff administration. Let us not forget the first year following the passage of the Underwood tariff law, especially the fall of 1914, when prices of factory and farm products fell below the cost of production. Millions were thrown out of employment, and beggars were to be seen on every street corner; cotton sold for less than 5 cents per pound, despite the buy-a-bale movement which was inaugurated in the hope of checking the downward trend of a depleted market. But for the World War this Nation was headed for the most serious industrial catastrophe in its history.

In the early fall of 1914 the sons of Europe were called from shop and farm to the battle field. Within only a few months Europe turned to America with a cry for food, raiment, and munitions of war. Soon mighty producing Europe ceased to be producers and became the greatest army of nonproducing consumers that ever assembled in the history of mankind. As the blood of the brave soldiers flowed, reddening the soil of their native land, Europe's savings of centuries began to pour by billions into the markets of America for food, raiment, and every conceivable article essential to the operations of war. Yet there are those who dare to boast of the prosperity of America during this awful period of death and carnage. Surely they have not stopped to think of the millions of graves that were made and the rivers of tears that were shed while prices were soaring and billions were pouring into pockets of the speculators of our country.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud of my country and its matchless industrial independence, and I want it to continue to prosper and grow, but I shall never boast of a prosperity that comes to my country fertilized with human blood and baptized in a sea of tears shed by a horror-stricken and war-ridden people. Give me a prosperity, Mr. Speaker, not stained by blood of home-defending heroes, a prosperity of mutual thrift, with an international intercourse which has both a friendly and profitable exchange, with doves of peace hovering about every nation's flag. Such a prosperity, I believe, will come as a result of the passage of this bill. Let us not have a prosperity which makes a few millionaires and millions penniless, as did the World War prosperity. Give us a prosperity for the man who earns his bread by the sweat of his face, be he a tiller of the soil or a keeper of the shop; that is the purpose of this bill, to protect American laborers, American manufacturers, and American farmers.

Mr. Speaker, it is the policy of protection that has made our country the richest and most prosperous Nation in the world. The second bill passed by the First American Congress was a protective tariff law, which was signed by President Washington July 4, 1789. The preamble to that measure was, "Whereas it is necessary for the support of government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufacturers that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported," and so forth. This bill was introduced by James Madison, a Democrat, a protectionist. In those days Democrats were protectionists. Many Democrats to-day are protectionists, even down in sunny Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, one of the compelling reasons which prompts my support of this bill is because it is the most favorable tariff law to the interest of the farmer ever proposed to an American Congress. The Underwood tariff law put practically all farm products on the free list. Under the Fordney tariff law nearly all farm products are protected by substantial duties.

Certain newspapers apparently are very much alarmed over the fact that the farmers' interests have been protected in this bill, and are complaining that the agricultural bloc, about which so much has been said, is responsible for what they term unjustified agricultural protection. I will admit that the fact the farmers' interests of our country have really received favorable legislative consideration might be some ground for surprise, since their interests have been so frequently disregarded; however, I want to say that this Congress has been the farmer's friend. This Congress put the War Finance Corporation in operation, which has loaned more than $300,000,000 to farmers and stock raisers throughout the country in the last 14 months. About ten millions of this amount was loaned to farmers, stock raisers, and cotton growers in Tennessee. This Congress appropriated $25,000,000 for Federal farm loans, increasing the capital of the farm-loan bank to fifty million. This Congress passed a law giving farmers the right to form interstate cooperative marketing associations, thus enabling the farmer to sell more directly to consumer and cut out the middleman's profits. This Congress appropriated $250,000,000 to be spent under the Federal aid plan for construction of public highways throughout the country, and of this amount more than five million goes to Tennessee. This Congress by special act gave the agricultural interests of the country a representative on the Federal Reserve Board, this being a distinct and deserving recognition of the agricultural interests of the country.

This Congress has ever been thoughtful of the farmer's interest. The immediate passage of the emergency tariff bill and other farm legislation which I have mentioned vindicates this contention. Being a Nation fresh from a World War, with an indebtedness of more than $24,000,000,000 and innumerable handicaps, we have now turned our face to the rising sun of peace and prosperity. During the last year we have paid more than one and one-half billion dollars of our national debt. We have reduced the taxes of the people $818,000,000. We have reduced our Government operating expenses $1,000,000,000. We reduced our Army and Navy expenditures $215,000,000. We are the only nation in the world, save Denmark and Great Britain, living within our income, notwithstanding the fact that we are spending approximately $2,000,000 a day on ex-service men for compensation, vocational rehabilitation, and hospitalization for the maimed and lame unfortunate defenders of freedom. Yet it is gratifying to know that Liberty bonds, which were selling for less than 85 per cent of their par value 18 months ago, are to-day selling for more than par. It is estimated that Liberty bond holders have realized more than $3,000,000,000 in the last year. The richest and most prosperous nation on earth, free from the shackles of European entangling alliances both as to our national sovereignty and industrial independence, we lead and point the way to an admiring and startled world.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, while it is impossible to discuss in any general way the provisions of the present tariff bill containing over 10,000 items, I feel that particular attention should be called to the proposed duty of $30 a ton on potash, which seriously affects adversely the agricultural interests of the country without material compensating benefit. This country consumes approximately 250,000 tons of potash. The highest estimate home producers make is that they can furnish only 50,000 tons, leaving 200,000 tons to be imported, and a tax on this amount will amount to $6,000,000, to be paid entirely by the agricultural interests of the country, already sorely burdened and seriously handicapped in various ways, among them being the deflation process inaugurated during this administration, which seems to have struck the farmer not only the first but the hardest blow.

I would despise myself were I to favor any legislation for the benefit of any particular class which at the same time might work injustice to all other classes. The problem of agriculture is one that affects the consumers well nigh as much as it affects the producer of agricultural products. The difficulties confronting this great basic industry are those from which the thoughtful patriot can not turn his eye. It is a significant fact that for the first time in the country's history a majority of the population is urban. Agriculture is but another form of industry. In fact, it is the basis of industry, because upon it depends the food supply.

The man who engages in it must receive a fair compensation and a return that is just, otherwise he will quit it, and when he quits, all who eat will feel the pinch. The drift from farm to city is seriously portentous. As I recall the figures from memory, in 1880 about 29 per cent of our population was contained in towns and cities of 2,500 population and upward. In 1890 this had increased to about 36 per cent, in 1900 to about 41 per cent, in 1910 to about 46 per cent, and in 1920 to 51.4 per cent. This growing increase in our urban population is sufficient to convince the thoughtful that their underlying disadvantages on the farm or discontent there imperatively calls for remedial legislation. Evidently the advantages offered our young people in the lines of industry and commerce are superior to those prevailing on the farm, and if these conditions with this drift toward the cities continues, this country, though rich in agriculture, must import foodstuff. In fact, that is just what is taking place. The importations to this country of a number of commodities have increased twentyfold in as many years. Note the importations of the following articles in 1900 and in 1920:

Imports.	1900	1920
Cattle	$2,257,684	$45,081,179
Meats	1,214,148	20,581,219
Butter	9,769	10,916,770
Cheese	1,761,613	6,180,972
Seeds	1,795,048	113,032,112
Sugar	100,250,974	688,127,380
Tobacco	13,297,223	78,164,290
Wool	20,260,936	212,848,568

These conditions make an imperative demand upon those administering government to do everything reasonable or possible to relieve it. An opportunity is here presented, by voting for the instruction to strike out the duty on one of the basic elements of the farmer's cost, to afford a small measure of relief which will result in benefit to all classes. I realize that by no process of legislative legerdemain can we or should we attempt to give habits of industry, thrift, economy, and sound judgment to the farmer. These he alone must individually acquire and practice if he would promote his own prosperity and welfare, but a few things the Government can do, should do, and to some extent is doing.

First. By scientific cooperation he can aid the farmer to increase his yield and the profits on his herds. This can be done by voting the necessary appropriations to advise him of the best methods in crop raising and particularly preventing diseases in his live stock.

Second. It can by proper legislation protect him from exploitation in his marketing, by promoting and encouraging a better system of marketing and preventing combinations to depress his markets, and eventually a cooperative system can possibly be worked out in the standardization of farm products so that sales and purchases can be intelligently made, useless transportation avoided, and, with the standardization and warehousing under proper safeguards, credits may be more freely and safely extended on farm commodities.

Third. It is incumbent upon the Government to see that the farmers' transportation facilities are reasonably efficient and at reasonable rates. In this matter the farmer is powerless. While it is peculiarly the function of the Federal Government to regulate commerce, some aid can be also extended in the matter of distributing reliable information in maintaining a proper balance between production and consumption.

Fourth. By Federal encouragement and aid to better roads and the dissemination of information as to the best methods of education the Federal Government can aid in making living conditions in the country more tolerable.

Fifth. The Federal Government can enlarge and extend under proper safeguards the system of farm credits so happily begun during the former Wilson administration.

The agricultural industry is peculiar in that notwithstanding it is but another form of industry, every other successful form of industry has its purchasing, its producing, and its selling departments. Agriculture has but one, the producing. The voice of this great basic industry is seldom heard either in Government or business. While the farmer is the largest contributor to the railroads, to the banks, and to the stability of commerce and manufacture, yet he has little potency in the management of any of these great forms of enterprise. The mere fact that a man is engaged in agriculture does not, of course, of itself qualify him for a position of power in these fields in which he has had little experience, yet some men could be selected who have an "agricultural mind" and who know and can appreciate the vital interests of this great basic industry, and in that way give it representation on some of the great boards of Government as well as upon the financial, commercial, and transportation boards.

It is a significant fact that with the waning of agriculture in the great governments of the past has begun the decay and final fall of these governments. It would be a useless consumption of time to argue the advantages to all classes of our people, consumers as well as producers, of using every available means to promote better living conditions in the country and the content that follows so as to prevent this constant and ominous drift of the country's young people toward the city.

Our population, which means our consumers, increased 14.9 per cent in the last decade, while agricultural production scarcely held its own. If this disparity continues for two or three decades, our exports of foodstuffs will well nigh cease, while our importations of farm products will largely increase. The country will face deprivation of this great factor now relied upon to maintain its favorable trade balances.

The value of the country's agricultural products in 1919 was approximately $13,000,000,000, in 1920 about $9,000,000,000, and in 1921 less than $6,000,000,000.

These and other adverse agricultural conditions that might readily be cited imperatively urge not only our favorable action in relieving the tariff on potash in the present instance, but our serious and sympathetic consideration of this great basic industry; not because of any particular class but because it so vitally affects all classes.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Speaker, in voting to-day for the final report of the conferees on the tariff, I do so with the firm conviction that no legislation will be more far-reaching nor more universally beneficial than this new tariff law, which we are about to write upon the statute books.

There are some who have complained at the length of time which it has taken to write this law; let it be remembered that in the very beginning we realized the herculean task confronting us in writing a tariff law, therefore we passed an emergency tariff law to take care of the emergency, that we might have a longer period in which to consider a permanent tariff law and thus write the best law possible.

The difficulties which have confronted the Congress in the preparation of this tariff law have been unparalleled. Conditions at home and abroad have been abnormal, particularly the great depreciation in the currencies of central Europe. For instance, if reduced to terms of American money, wages in Germany are between $2 and $3 per week.

The rates of duty on agricultural products are more nearly adequate than those in any previous general tariff law and are intended to place the products of the farm on the same basis of protection as our manufactures have been in previous protective tariff measures.

The rates of duty on articles of manufacture are generally lower than those in the Payne-Aldrich bill.

This is the first general tariff bill in which the interests of the farmer have been given careful and serious consideration but is strictly in harmony with the policies of the Republican Party, for it makes no difference to us whether it be the product of the farm or the product of the factory, our motto is: "Buy at home, if it can be produced at home."

The time has come when we must determine upon a definite agricultural policy. We must have farming conditions which will insure to the farmer and his family both financial rewards and educational, social, and religious living conditions fairly comparable to those offered by the cities. A sound system of agriculture can not be maintained on any other basis.

DOES A PROTECTIVE TARIFF CRIPPLE AMERICA'S SALE OF GOODS IN WORLD MARKETS?

One of the favorite arguments of free traders, importers, and internationalists, who are more concerned about "abroad" than they are about "America," is that a protective tariff will cripple America's foreign markets and result in diminished exports. All sorts of twisted reasoning is offered in support of this argument.

The best test of its soundness and validity is the experience of the United States under protective tariffs. If a protective tariff curtails our foreign markets, the records of exports during the periods when a protective tariff was in force should and would show the fact.

But the records of foreign trade issued by the Department of Commerce show just the contrary.

The McKinley protective tariff law was enacted in 1890. The following is the official record of our exports during the years the McKinley and other protective tariff laws were in force:

1892	1,030,278,148
1893	847,665,194
1894	892,140,572

The Dingley protective tariff law was enacted in 1897. The following is the official record of our exports during the 11 years that tariff law was in operation:

1898	$1,231,482,330
1899	1,227,023,302
1900	1,394,483,082
1901	1,487,765,991
1902	1,381,719,401
1903	1,420,141,079
1904	1,460,827,271
1905	1,518,561,666
1906	1,743,864,500
1907	1,880,851,078
1908	1,860,773,346

The Payne-Aldrich protective tariff law was enacted in 1909. The following is the official record of our exports during the operation of that tariff act:

1909	$1,663,011,104
1910	1,754,984,720
1911	2,049,320,199
1912	2,204,322,409
1913	2,465,884,149

These official figures conclusively prove the falsity of the propaganda that a protective tariff means a loss of our foreign markets. They are an absolute refutation of the free trade and importing propaganda that unless we permit foreign producers to grab our markets we can not hope to sell abroad.

In the summer of 1920 the farming and live-stock interests were suddenly flung into a period of low prices and hard times that has not been equaled for a generation in the history of American agriculture.

Two factors largely contributed to this condition: First, an increasingly large quantity of agricultural imports from various countries admitted free under the Underwood Tariff Act. These quantities while not comparable with the tremendous production of the American farm yet were sufficient when dumped on the market to break farm prices just at the time the American producer was marketing his year's crops. Second, the sudden and unwarranted restriction of credit to the American farmer in the summer of 1920 by the Democratic administration.

The American farmer had raised a tremendous crop in 1920. He had raised it at the peak of cost of farm labor, farm implements, and other material which entered into the production of his crop. But before he harvested it the Democratic administration had made it known that his loans would be called; that his notes in the banks would not be renewed; that new credit would be denied him.

Simultaneously with the deflation of farm credits the American farmer had to contend with larger quantities of agricultural imports of all characters than ever before in the history of this country. These imports included grain from Argentina and Canada; potatoes, eggs, and butter from Denmark and Canada; beef from Argentina and Canada; lamb and mutton from Australia, New Zealand, and England; and other agricultural products from various quarters of the globe. All of these agricultural products were being imported free of duty under the Underwood tariff and dumped into our market, which was already demoralized.

For the purpose of stopping this tremendous flood of agricultural imports, the Ways and Means Committee of the Republican House of Representatives, on December 20, 1920, introduced the emergency or farmers' tariff bill. The bill passed the House December 22. It was opposed on the floor of the House by such Democratic leaders as Cordell Hull, then a Representative in Congress from Tennessee, now Democratic national chairman; Oldfield, of Arkansas; Quin, of Mississippi; Young, of Texas; Garrett, of Texas; and Rainey, of Illinois, who was the floor leader of the Democratic opposition.

After the Christmas recess the Senate took up the bill and passed it February 16, 1921. Here, as in the House, the Democratic leaders were lined up almost solid against the enactment of the farmers' tariff.

On March 4, 1921, President Harding was inaugurated. Congress was called into a special session. It convened April 11. Immediately the farmers' tariff, which had been passed by the Republican Congress and vetoed by President Wilson was reintroduced. It speedily passed both the House and Senate, was signed by President Harding, and became a law May 27, 1921. The Democratic leaders in both branches of Congress opposed its enactment, as they did in the previous Congress, and as they are opposing the passage of the present bill. They opposed its enactment upon two grounds—

(1) They alleged the prices of farm products were determined by the markets of the world—as, for example, the price of American wheat was determined by the market in Liverpool—and a protective tariff would not and could not benefit the American farmer.

(2) It was argued that the effect of such a tariff would mean an increase in the retail cost of food derived from the farm products.

MARKET REPORTS SHOW TARIFF KEPT AMERICAN FARM PRICES ABOVE THOSE OF OTHER COUNTRIES.

The farmers' tariff had been in effect 15 months. During that time, and under its operation, the American farmer marketed his 1921 harvests. The best answer as to how the tariff has affected American farm prices is the record of farm prices in American markets and of markets in other countries. This record shows that prices of farm products, live stock, and meat products have steadily declined the world over during the last year, but that decline in these prices has been far less in the United States than in other markets. The market reports show that immediately upon the enactment of the emergency tariff the decline of prices of farm products in this country was checked, and that under the operation of that tariff prices of farm products in the United States have been materially higher than the world prices of the same products. It further shows that the margin between farm prices in the United States and prices elsewhere has steadily increased in favor of the American farmer since the enactment of the tariff.

Take wheat as the first example. Under the Underwood Act passed in 1913 and still in effect, except where its provisions have been repealed by the emergency tariff, wheat was admitted free into this country. The farmers' tariff levied a duty of 35 cents per bushel on wheat and an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent on wheat flour.

From a report issued June 26, 1922, by the United States Tariff Commission, the following is quoted:

> Under conditions of free trade between the United States and Canada, Winnipeg prices of No. 1 Manitoba wheat normally exceeded the Minnesota prices of No. 1 Northern Spring by 5 or 6 cents per bushel. After the passage of the emergency act Minnesota prices gradually came to exceed Winnipeg prices by 25 to 27 cents per bushel. This difference in favor of the American market has been consistently maintained ever since, due to the protection afforded the American farmer in his own market.

It is significant, however, that this increase in the differential after the passage of the emergency act is not due to an increase in American prices, but rather to a relatively greater decrease in Canadian prices. Minnesota prices gradually declined during the whole year of 1921, but Winnipeg quotations went down more precipitately with the result that the differential was about equal to the duty by the time the Canadian crop reached the market in the fall of 1921.

OFFICIAL MARKET REPORTS FURNISH CONCLUSIVE PROOF OF BENEFIT OF FARMERS' TARIFF.

The following table gives the average price, per bushel, of No. 1 Northern Spring wheat at Minneapolis and Winnipeg for each month since the enactment of the emergency tariff; this table clearly illustrates the above statement, namely, that although wheat prices declined in this country after the emergency tariff went into effect they did not decline as much as they did in Canada, which conclusively proves that the American tariff protected the American farmer.

	Minneapolis.	Winnipeg.
May, 1921	$1.64	$1.67
June	1.69	1.68
July	1.74	1.61
August	1.54	1.62
September	1.53	1.32
October	1.36	1.09
November	1.30	1.01
December	1.31	1.05
January, 1922	1.35	1.08
February	1.55	1.28
March	1.58	1.36
April	1.64	1.39

The effect of the emergency tariff upon the imports of wheat and flour into the United States and its corresponding protection of the American market for the American farmer can readily be noted from the following:

In 1920 we imported during the months of October, November, and December, when wheat came in free under the Underwood bill, as follows:

Bushels of wheat imported in 1920.

October	10,537,120
November	10,430,079
December	12,255,703

When the farmers' emergency tariff bill, levying a duty of 35 cents per bushel on wheat, was in effect we imported, the three corresponding months of 1921, as follows:

Bushels of wheat imported in 1921.

October	1,084,017
November	1,556,498
December	2,312,522

By referring to the table showing the price of wheat in Minneapolis and Winnipeg from May, 1921, to April, 1922, it will be noticed that in—

	Price.	Winnipeg price.	Difference.
October, 1921, Minneapolis prices were	$1.36	$1.09	$0.27
November, 1921, Minneapolis prices were	1.30	1.01	.29
December, 1921, Minneapolis prices were	1.31	1.05	.26

Will anyone deny that under free trade one of two things would have happened—either Minneapolis prices would have been brought below the Winnipeg prices, as they were in May, 1921, when the tariff went into effect, or tremendous quantities of wheat would have been imported, very much to the detriment of the American market?

The emergency tariff has been equally instrumental in maintaining the price of dairy products of the American farmer.

In 1920 the United States imported four times as much butter, under the Underwood tariff, than during any previous year in the history of the country. Denmark was the source of 53 per cent of the butter imports. About 25 per cent came from Canada, 11 per cent from Argentina, and 8 per cent from the Netherlands.

Under the Underwood Act potatoes were admitted to the United States free. During the years 1919 and 1920 the importation of potatoes into this country was greater than any two previous years in the history of American agriculture. Eighty-two per cent of the imports came from Canada, 9 per cent from Denmark.

Potatoes are a seasonal and a perishable product. They must be disposed of within a period of six to eight months after their gathering. Unable to store the crop indefinitely, the farmer is compelled to ship to market soon after harvest. It can readily be seen what effect a cargo of several hundred thousand bushels of potatoes from Denmark would have upon the price of American potatoes if they were dumped upon the American market at the time the American grower had to sell his crop. Furthermore, when the American market is impaired by such dumping its recovery is very slow, requiring weeks and sometimes months before normal prices are again reached.

Speculators took advantage of this under the free trade Underwood Act to import potatoes for the express purpose of breaking the American market at the very time the American potato grower had to dispose of his crop. The result was a break in the American market which meant a loss to the American potato grower of the profit of his entire crop.

Do these facts not prove the fallacy of the contention of our Democratic friends that we do not need a tariff on agricultural products because there are no imports of foreign farm products?

Of course, it may seem, as some of our Democratic friends claim, that any additional price paid the farmers must be added to the price the consumer pays. This would be true, if the consumer bought direct from the producer, but the truth is, that with the exception of the produce and a few other products sold by the farmers themselves on the markets of our cities and towns, the prices of which are not affected by any tariff legislation one way or another, but are governed entirely by the law of supply and demand, practically nothing is sold direct, but through the middlemen, with the result that prices, at the time crops are harvested, are frequently so low that they do not cover the cost of harvesting, much less the cost of raising the crop. The result is that a large portion of the crop is lost, causing a shortage later when abnormal prices are charged.

Let me illustrate. Two years ago lemons were brought into the eastern market from Southern Europe and sold for $2.40 a box—at that time it cost the American grower in California more than $2.40 a box to pick, clean, pack, provide the packing material, boxes, and so forth, and pay commissions for selling and freight to the eastern market. As a result, a large portion of the crop was not harvested. Later in the season, due to the short supply, lemons were selling in this same market at from $4 to $5 per box. My point is, had a tariff been levied so that the grower would have been able to secure, say $3 per box and thereby saved the crop, the consumer would have paid less on the average, and the grower would have had a small profit on his entire crop.

The same is true of cotton. Thousands of acres of cotton were plowed down because the prices obtainable did not cover the cost of picking and baling it. Later, after the middlemen and speculators had gotten the major portion of the crop into their hands, prices doubled and trebled, due in large part to the short supply, and both producer and consumer suffered accordingly.

Had there been a tariff to maintain the price of cotton at a point warranting the picking of the cotton, the prices would never have soared as they did, because of the quantity on hand. The result would have been that the grower of the cotton would have had return on his crop, and the consumer would have paid only a reasonable price, benefiting both producer and consumer.

As a matter of fact, that is just exactly what a protective tariff is for. It is not for the benefit of one class at the expense of the other. Let us remember that the farmer is not only the Nation's greatest producer, but he is also the Nation's greatest consumer. The farming class is the greatest single buyer in America of manufactured products of all kinds.

It is the largest consumer of steel of any class of users of steel in America with the exception of the railroads.

Directly and indirectly it consumes 46 per cent of the wool products of the United States.

It is the greatest single buyer of textile goods, because in addition to clothing and household textiles the farmer uses a great quantity of textiles in his work, such as sacks, bagging, and so forth.

The farming class is the greatest single buyer of leather goods, because in addition to the shoes, gloves, and other articles of leather which are bought and used by all classes of people, the farmer is the buyer of heavy leather goods, such as boots, and an extensive buyer of such articles as harness and other leather articles used in farm operation.

According to statistics issued by the American Automobile Association, the American farmer purchases 30 per cent of all motor vehicles manufactured in the United States. He to-day is the owner and user of more motor vehicles than are owned and used by all the people in all the other nations of the world outside the United States.

Everything which the farmer produces and sells must be hauled to the markets. Everything which the farmer buys must be hauled to him. Therefore the farmer is easily the largest shipper of freight in America.

In view of all this it was necessary, not only for the protection and salvation of the farmer himself but for the protection of the rest of the country and the welfare of all industry and business, that the agricultural classes should be given all the benefits which can be derived from tariff legislation.

It is impossible for me to go into details on the various schedules, except to say that possibly if I had written the bill some of the schedules would be lower than they are in the bill and possibly some of the articles on the free list would be on the dutiable list, but I am quite sure that earnest, sincere, and conscientious consideration was given all of these schedules by the members of the Ways and Means Committee in the House and the members of the Finance Committee in the Senate. These men have had the benefit of hearings on all of these schedules and undoubtedly have reached their conclusions by the evidence presented.

I do not doubt but that some mistakes have been made, but, on the whole, I believe that this bill will meet generally with the approval of the American people and will hasten our return to national prosperity.

I am particularly pleased with that legislative feature of the bill which provides that the President of the United States may, upon the advice of the Tariff Commission, make certain changes in the schedules within certain limitations.

This feature has been bitterly opposed by some of our Democratic friends upon the ground that we are giving too much power into the hands of the President.

In my judgment, no President is going to abuse this power, and it will, when only a few schedules need adjusting, obviate the necessity of rewriting the entire tariff law, which is always accompanied, because of the uncertainty of the new rates, with a certain degree of business depression, which seriously affects the commercial, industrial, and economic interests of the Nation.

In my judgment, this is one of the greatest forward steps and constructive features ever embodied in a revenue measure, and in the course of a few years will result in having upon the statute books the best, most scientific tariff law it is possible to have, as it will permit the correction of any errors which may have crept into the bill in its enactment.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker, California has been well cared for in the tariff bill just passed. Most of our products, especially those of southern California, come into direct competition with the cheaply produced foreign products. Many of our industries, in which millions of dollars are invested and which give employment to many thousand laborers, would soon perish but for the benevolent influence of the policy of protective tariff. Our lemon and lemon products must compete with those of Italy and Sicily. The manufacture of citric acid at Corona and National City has been having a struggle for bare existence against foreign competition. Our walnuts must meet the products of France, Italy, and China, while our almonds those grown in Spain, Italy, and France. Beans grown along the coast from San Diego to Santa Barbara conflict with those from Manchuria and Madagascar. The products of our poultry must be sold against the eggs imported from China. Our dairies must compete with butter from Canada and substitute oils from the Tropics. The fish canneries of southern California must meet a flood of cheaply produced goods from the Scandinavian countries and from France and Italy. Sugar produced in large quantities from beets grown in Orange and San Bernardino Counties must meet competition from sugar grown in Cuba. Olive oil comes in great quantities to our country from Spain, while honey is imported from Central and South America.

True, in this bill we did not receive all that we asked for nor all that we thought we were entitled to; still, from the standpoint of California industries, it is the best tariff that was ever enacted into law. And considering the fact that in the matter of many of our products our State stands alone as a producer while all the other 47 States are interested solely as consumers, what has been won may well indeed be considered a splendid victory for our farmers, and I predict that in the years to come this tariff will prove a substantial contribution to their prosperity.

A comparison of the rates in this bill with those fixed in the Payne-Aldrich tariff, the last preceding Republican tariff, and those of the Underwood tariff, the law in force during the Democratic administration, shows just how great a gain has been made for California industries:

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I have always been glad to speak of and in behalf of the Republican Party for many reasons. Not the least of these reasons is that it is the party of protection. When the Republican Party is in power, there is no financial panic, no famine at the fireside, no bread line, no soup kitchen, no men walking the streets asking other men, in God's name, not for money but for bread; when the Republican Party is in power all the wheels are turning, all the fires are burning, and all the people learning the important lesson that when the Republican Party is in power the American people wear more clothes, the American people own more homes, and the American people actually eat more bread. In all its existence the Republican Party has worked and legislated for the welfare of the men who work with their hands, on the farm and in the field, on the one hand, and on the other hand in the factory and the mine, so that Republican legislation, passed by Republican Congresses and Republican Presidents, has given to the worker here in America more of pay and less of pain and less of peril and more of peace than labor ever saw before at any time, in any clime, beneath the shining sun. The tariff laws that gave America protection against the pauper labor of Europe and Asia were a great part of this Republican effort. The Republican Party has always been the best labor party and the best business party, and this moment it is demonstrating that it is the most patriotic party by showing how loyally it refrained from embarrassing President Woodrow Wilson when he was President in war time, and how bravely, quickly, and economically it is now aiding President Harding in peace time in his brave, quick, and economical fight to get back to normal conditions in spite of embarrassments interposed by Democratic leadership in Congress and the Democratic press. And now, as we pass this tariff bill and thereby complete our fight for right construction, I am sure this powerful, progressive, optimistic, forward-looking, upward-climbing, hopeful, liberty-loving party—party of the settlers' homestead, party of the soldiers' pension, party of enfranchisement and not disfranchisement, party of the free ballot and the fair count—is taking one more step toward the America for which the great Washington warred and the great Lincoln died, that America which is the heir of the ages, the child of the century, the beacon light of liberty, and the last hope of humanity.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, there is little doubt in my mind but that what I or any other Democratic Member of this House is going to say on the pending bill will not in the slightest change the action of the majority of this House. The tariff law that is proposed is an out-and-out party measure, and the Republicans are going to vote for it regardless of its iniquities and of the monstrous burdens it is going to throw upon the people of the United States, but I feel it my duty to add my voice to the already accumulating protest that is coming from all over this country against what I am sure is to be one of the most monstrous and impudent pieces of legislation that the Republican majority proposes to enact.

The Nation will soon know, as every Member that is going to vote for the bill does know, that the policy behind it is dictated by the special interests of this country for their enrichment, and the disastrous consequences that are to follow are not merely speculative but certain. You can not escape liability for it and you will have to assume the full responsibility.

About 15 months ago, when the tariff bill was before the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, stated that the measure presented was the result of three months' hard labor on the part of his committee, and the country ought to know that in the debate that then followed he admitted that it was the work and labor of the Republican members of the committee and that the Democratic members had not even been invited to be present at the sessions. Unable then to enact it into law through months of logrolling, and viewing with alarm how after the election of President Harding conditions began to grow worse from day to day, it was decided to pass a so-called emergency tariff bill. You all remember the assurances that were given out at that time; what benefits the measure would bring to the Nation. You have now seen these benefits, although you raised the tariff on wheat, corn, and other commodities sky-high. The farmers were obliged to sell their wheat at a starvation price, and the poor consumer was compelled to pay the price for your protection of the speculator, the commission merchant, and the middleman.

You may imagine that the propaganda that you have carried on amongst the farmers since then will get them to swallow this poisonous bill of yours, but I assure you that the day of reckoning will come. If their suffering under the Republican administration thus far has not been sufficient to awaken them enough, what you propose to do now will be when they discover that already your proposed palliatives were prepared solely for the purpose of enabling your manipulators and profiteers to further fill their bulky coffers without so much as paying the farmer for his labor. I am only sorry that the tillers of the soil of this great Nation are compelled to learn their tariff lesson at such an awful price to themselves and to the consuming public.

The tariff of 30 cents a bushel on wheat and 15 cents a bushel on corn can be proposed only by those who assume that the whole country is so ignorant that it does not know that its purpose is not protection since we are exporters rather than importers of these commodities, and that its sole purpose is a protection to the gamblers and profiteers in their illicit trade of heavily taxing every pound of bread that is being consumed by the public. Why, Mr. Speaker, you are proposing to levy an indirect tax upon every morsel of food that men use. Rye, barley, oats, potatoes, sugar, and even milk has not escaped you. Every stitch of material that goes into the garment of the working man and the middle class is taxed over 100 per cent, as is the fruit of the loom.

With the exception of your overfed profiteers and those that thrive on special privileges which you propose to increase, with the whole Nation struggling under the most burdensome taxation, and in the face of the combined efforts to reduce the earning capacity of the workingman, you now propose to extort additional billions from this staggering multitude, and you call it "protection." Republican protection, Mr. Speaker, is the protection of the vulture to prey upon the millions of our people who but two years ago trusted you and reposed their confidence in their innocent belief that you would represent their interests.

If I recall correctly, some of your orators promised to reduce the cost of living; and is this how you propose to do it, by taxing every commodity which is the necessity of life? Who, Mr. Speaker, dictated this tariff bill? Is it possible that Members of this Congress should deliberately attempt such a monstrosity in ignorance of its consequences? How you can escape the conclusion that must eventually follow that it was dictated solely by those interests who alone can benefit by it. A child can see that the farming element of the country can benefit nothing by it; that the small merchant can gain nothing; and that the consumer has everything to lose, for he and he alone will pay the price. And the laboring men will not only have to pay increased cost of everything they wear and everything they must eat in order to live, but this bill will destroy every opportunity for increased labor and dooms the country to even increased unemployment—a thing which already has reached unbearable proportions since the protecting hand of the Democratic administration has been removed. You are going to shut the doors against all commodities that are produced in the struggling countries of Europe. How, then, will you be able to sell to them anything that we produce here? The only hope for relief of the present unemployment situation lies in the increased exportation of the products of our soil and our factories. But Europe is bankrupt. They have no gold with which to pay us for anything they might want to buy. The only purchasing power that they have lies in that which they can produce. With that and that alone can they buy our commodities and if you build a Chinese tariff wall around our country and prevent any of their products to come in here, you immediately cut off every possibility for us to sell anything in any of these countries, and if these foreign markets are shut to us the present tragical unemployment situation will not only not find relief but will be enormously increased.

Mr. Speaker, I am not talking only as a Democrat in the hope of pointing out the iniquities of the Republican majority. I am speaking as an American seeing a danger ahead of us that must be evident to all and is evident even to the right thinking adherents of the Republican Party. Several leading Republican newspapers throughout this country are crying out against it. Your New York Tribune, a Republican newspaper, calls your bill a monstrosity. Your Boston Transcript, Republican, frankly admits that this bill is a disgrace to the party in power and a menace to the Nation, and openly charges that it is a conspiracy between pork-barrel politicians and special interests for the twofold purpose of reelecting the politicians and paying new tribute to the special interests. What stronger terms can a Democrat use?

Mr. Speaker, it is hard to believe that the Republicans have forgotten the alluring promises that they made during their campaign. Even if it were made solely for the purpose of catching votes some obligation ought to be felt in your party to live up in some remote way to those promises; even if you forget your duty to the Nation, your own selfish interests should make you pause and hesitate before you write upon the statute book this monstrous tax upon the people, which even if done for the purpose of raising revenue for the country, and every cent of this tax go into the Government's Treasury, it would still be unjustifiable. How much more so, when the billions that are going to be extorted from the people as a result of it will go directly into the bulging pockets of the profiteers and privileged class.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, September 14, 1922.

Rev. Wallace Radcliffe, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O Lord, what is man that Thou art mindful of him or the son of man that Thou visitest him? Thou madest him a little lower than the angels and hast crowned him with glory and honor. Teach us the responsibility of this crown, that our bodies may be made temples of the Holy Ghost and every day to us be made a Sabbath and every service a sacrament.

Bless the United States Senate and all associated with them in their work for the Government. Endow them with Thy special providence and grace for every duty. Care for the young pages. God bless the lads, that this Chamber may be to them a school of training for faithful citizenship and for Christian manhood. Grant Thy spirit to-day to Thy servants in all Thou dost commit to them, that the beginning and the continuance and the end of their service may be indeed as a blessing upon the Republic and to the glory of Thy name. In Jesus Christ. Amen.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR BRANDEGEE.

Mr. MOSES. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, in 8-point type, an address delivered by the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] at the State Republican convention, which was held yesterday in Hartford in that State.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, in 8-point type, as follows:

Senator BRANDEGEE spoke in part as follows:

"Ladies and gentlemen of the convention, in 1912 the Republican Party, after remaining in power with few interruptions since the close of the War between the States, divided its forces and its historic foe, the Democratic Party, although in the minority in the country, came into power. One of the earliest acts was the passage of a tariff bill, the disastrous effects of which became apparent almost immediately. Imports into this country from foreign lands steadily and rapidly increased. Our own labor was thrown out of employment, our mills and factories were rapidly closing, and the country was saved from commercial disaster only by the breaking out of the great European war. That war created such a demand for our products and absorbed the products of the belligerents to such an extent that it operated, as far as this country was concerned, as a high protective tariff to American industries and American labor. Our imports at once fell off and our export trade was swelled to unprecedented proportions.

"During the war partisanship at home was reduced to a minimum and the entire strength of the Nation was concentrated in the effort to procure unity of action, and every other consideration was subordinated to winning the war. The Republican Party loyally supported the administration in power in its war measures and contributed its full share of men and money to the cause. Partisanship, however, was resurrected in 1918 by the call of President Wilson for the election of a Congress Democratic in both branches. This ill-advised action of the former President provoked such deep resentment in the hearts of the people that a Republican House of Representatives was elected.

"The gross and reckless extravagance and maladministration of the Democratic Party and the attempt of that party to permanently entangle this country in the complexities of European affairs so aroused the people that in the election of 1920 the people called the Republican Party back to complete control of the Government by a popular plurality of over 7,000,000 votes. This stupendous victory, far excelling in its dimensions any that had preceded it in the entire history of the country, accurately gauged the hot resentment of the people against Democratic mismanagement and incompetency.

"The people chose as the head of the Government that typical American, Warren G. Harding. I refer to him as a typical American because, like the great majority of successful Americans, he was a self-made man. He had worked his way up from poverty and a humble station almost unaided, except by his native qualities of mind and character, from the position of typesetter in a newspaper office to that of a State senator of his native State of Ohio, thence to the position of lieutenant governor of his State, and then to the United States Senate, from which position the people called him to the Presidency of the richest and most powerful Nation on earth. In these various positions President Harding had come into intimate personal contact with the great masses of the people. He is quick in his sympathies, cool in judgment, consistent in conduct, and courageous in action. He knows and understands the great masses of the American people and the motives and feelings which actuate them. He is a just man, he has an open mind, and is as free as it is possible for a human being to be from envy, jealousy, and malice. He earnestly desires the peace and prosperity of the people, and his every thought is directed to how he can contribute to their welfare.

"When he entered the White House on March 4, 1921, just 18 months ago, he was confronted with the wreckage and entanglements of the great World War. No one who has not had to contemplate the elements of this intricate and complicated aftermath can possibly realize the stupendous task which devolved upon the shoulders of the President. Situations existed for which there was no known precedent; problems pressed for solution for which there was no analogy; many of our soldiers were still in foreign lands; our finances were involved; the Nation had accumulated a war debt of some $24,000,000,000, nearly half of which had been loaned to foreign nations who had been our associates in the war; the great war machine had to be disjointed; our Army and our Navy had to be reduced to normal proportions; and a policy had to be framed for the disposition of the vast merchant fleet which we had constructed as a war measure. Deflation from the tremendous inflation and consequent high prices of the war period was a necessity.

"The first act of the President commanded the approval and secured the confidence of the country. He selected a strong and well-balanced group of advisers as his Cabinet, and placed at its head a former Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, who had also been a candidate of the Republican Party for the Presidency in the previous national election. The President and his Cabinet forthwith plunged into the gigantic task of clearing away the débris of the war and setting the Nation's house in order. We were still in a technical state of war with the former enemy countries and peace must be officially established. Treaties of peace were negotiated and ratified, by the terms of which America secured all her demands without becoming enmeshed in the broils or jealousies of the Old World, and without approving any of the iniquities of the treaty of Versailles. The independence of America has been preserved, and her international influence and prestige were never so high.

OUR FOREIGN RELATIONS.

"The United States of America is at peace with all the world. Every foreign country seeks our good will and friendship, and has them. We are constrained by no entangling alliances in our future course of action, but are free to use our influence and determine our own course in any future emergency as our people may decide. This is the historic American policy, and it is wiser to-day than ever before.

"One of the most signal triumphs of President Harding was the result of the conference of a group of the principal powers of the world recently held in Washington upon the subject of the limitation of armaments. The principal reason why this conference resulted so satisfactorily was because the number of nations which participated in it was small. Another cause which contributed to its success was the fact that too much was not attempted. If all the nations of the world had been called together insurmountable objections on the part of some would surely have arisen. If immediate and complete disarmament had been insisted upon nothing would have been accomplished. The plan pursued by the administration and its distinguished representatives at the conference was along the line of a continuous and graduated reduction of naval armaments during the period of five years. At the end of that period the reduction in naval armaments will have been very material, and the amount of money saved the people of the participating nations, and the relief to their taxpayers, will have been very substantial. Nor has the relative position of America in naval strength upon the sea been sacrificed, but in response to the undoubted wish of the people, and their passionate desire for the preservation of the peace of the world, the initial step has been taken, and the spirit which pervaded the conference greatly encourages the hope that other similar conferences will be held leading to still further reduction of armaments upon both land and sea. For the successful conduct and termination of this conference President

Harding and his administration are entitled to and have received the deep gratitude of the representative men of the world. But as gratifying as the result of this great conference was, it is only one of a long list of accomplishments by the administration for the benefit of the people.

DEMANDS UPON CONGRESS.

"Upon several previous occasions I have had occasion in addressing Republican State conventions to direct attention to the ever-increasing demand for legislation by the Federal Government. During an experience of 20 years in Congress I am increasingly convinced that altogether too much reliance is placed upon the efficacy of acts of Congress as final remedies.

"A great mass of the measures which are pressed upon Congress are entirely beyond the constitutional power of Congress to deal with. Many people demand action at Washington for the cure of evils which could be much better treated by the application of the laws of their own States.

"Wherever possible the people of a State should make their own laws for their own government, where they can be enforced by their own citizens and modified and repealed by them when necessary. Home rule and local self-government are always best for any people. The people of a State are apt to be better acquainted with each other; they understand each other better; they are apt to be more homogeneous in blood and more alike in customs, habits, and aspirations than are the people of States separated from each other by great distances. The States should, therefore, if they desire to retain home rule and local self-government, rely upon their own legislatures and exercise their own powers to the fullest extent. They should realize that they have all the powers that they had before they created the Federal Government, except such powers as they have specifically or by necessary implication delegated to the Federal Government.

"The demand for the passage of new laws by Congress and the methods of expressing that demand have multiplied manyfold in recent years. This is accounted for to a large extent by the increasing tendency of those interested in a common cause, business, or calling to organize and press their claims upon Congress. Organizations seem to have become the order of the day, and conventions of the various organizations are held at short periods, at which committees are appointed to insist upon a certain course of legislative procedure. The ease of communication, the great facility and the low price of communicating intelligence, the practical elimination of time and space within certain limits, caused by the railroad, the telegraph, and the telephone, have encouraged greatly unity of action by blocs for their own interests and their own purposes, many times without reference to the good of the general public. There is hardly a question of any importance which comes before Congress upon which these various organizations and blocs do not divide, and many of them divide with reference to their own personal interests alone.

"The result of this propaganda, perhaps, is quite different from that which its originators intend. It is frequently asserted that all Members of Congress are cowards and care nothing about the merit of measures, but are only concerned with the number of votes which are supposed to be obtained. The idea is sought to be conveyed that when a measure is up for consideration the organization which has the largest number of members and which threatens the most violently will get the votes of Members of Congress because of their fears, but where so many organizations adopt the same tactics in order to procure legislation they are apt to neutralize the efforts of each other. Members of Congress are no braver and no more cowardly than the voters who elect them. I have seen many Members of Congress stand by their convictions of what was right, uninfluenced by the threats of political extermination which were daily hurled at them, and I have seen many of them reelected because they stood by what they thought was right in spite of the pressure to the contrary.

"There is hardly an important subject which comes before Congress upon which one's constituents are not of various minds. A Member of Congress should always be glad to know what his constituents think about questions which he is called upon to help decide. Most Congressmen are anxious to know what their constituents think of the question at issue, and are anxious to get all the information possible bearing upon the subject under consideration; but mere threats to destroy a Representative if he does not vote as his constituent would like to have him, in my judgment, is more apt to damage the cause of the person who makes such threats than it is to help it. No self-respecting Member of Congress will bow meekly to an attempt at intimidation.

ADMINISTRATION ACCOMPLISHMENTS.

"President Harding was elected for a term of four years. Eighteen months of that time have gone by. The Democratic press of the country has been devoting itself assiduously to the attempt to create an impression that little has been done in that time. No greater mistake than this could possibly be made. The President and his Cabinet and all his heads of bureaus have been continuously at work. The Congress has been in almost continual session. It has had to deal with a long list of vital and troublesome questions. Emergencies have arisen one after another in continuous procession. Most of them have been successfully grappled with and settled; others are in process of settlement; a few remain unsettled and with little progress made toward settlement, but they are very few, and time and patience and common sense will surely bring them to a successful issue.

"To those Democratic friends, both persons and press, who think they improve their political prospects by repeating to themselves the phrase 'Congress has done nothing,' I would suggest that they consider the following list of measures passed by this Congress which they elected in November, 1920. The list is far from complete, but I have selected some of the more important measures:

"An act has been passed to restrict immigration into this country to 3 per cent of the nationals of any country who were in the United States at the time of the taking of the census of 1910. The immigration problem was complicated by conditions resulting from the Great War. Millions of people in foreign countries were clamoring for entrance into this country in order to escape the high taxation, the military service, the want, misery, and devastation which existed in their old land abroad. Many of our own workers were out of employment. It was almost impossible to apply existing selective tests to the flood of threatened immigration. These prospective immigrants in certain cases came from countries which were afflicted with contagious diseases and their entrance into this country would have been a great peril to the health of our people. By the wise limitation set by this act immigrants are to be admitted only in such numbers as will be readily absorbed and Americanized.

"A commission was created to fund and fix the time and conditions of payment of the vast sums which we had loaned the countries with which we had been associated during the war. This commission is now engaged in its difficult task in conference with agents appointed by our foreign debtor nations.

"An agricultural credits relief bill was passed authorizing the War Finance Corporation to extend credit to the extent of a billion dollars to aid in carrying and disposing of agricultural products, and to provide credit for agricultural purposes. Under the provisions of this bill the War Finance Corporation has loaned to exporters $9,732,608; to cooperative marketing associations, $96,899,634; to banks and financing institutions, $233,972,230; to live-stock loan companies, $59,693,608; making a grand total of $400,298,081, which relief has proved most helpful to the farmers of the country. No class of our population has suffered more by the readjustment of prices from the high points attained during the war than the farmers of the country. During the war the farmers had been induced to cultivate larger tracts of land and had borrowed heavily in the purchase of agricultural machinery and other necessities at high prices and at high rates of interest. When deflation began the prices of agricultural products dropped precipitately, and in many instances the value of the crops raised was less than their cost of production. The prices of the things which the farmers had to buy did not drop in proportion to the prices of what he had to sell. The result was that the farmer was caught and ground between the upper and the nether millstones. This constituted an acute emergency and the quick relief extended by Congress contributed largely to the solution of the crisis.

"An emergency tariff bill was also passed as a temporary expedient to protect the products of the farmer from the ruinous competition which was resulting from the low cost of labor abroad. This bill will remain in effect only until the new general revision of the tariff shall take effect. The plight in which the agricultural interests of the country had been caught reacted upon the entire industrial system. The purchasing power of the farmer having been impaired and almost destroyed, he was unable to buy the products of our mills and manufactures. Our mills and manufactures, which at the same time were attempting to readjust their production from war materials to products required in time of peace, lost their farmer customers. The railroads and other transportation interests of the country were deprived of the business of hauling the products of the manufacturers to the farmers, and in large measure of the products of the farms to the consumers. The credit of the farmers was strained to the utmost and the resources of the financial institutions of the country had to deal with a system of frozen credits contracted at a time of high prices and extended upon the shrunken value of collateral security. Thus the vicious circle was complete and demonstrated conclusively the interdependence throughout the country existing between agricultural production, manufacturing, and transportation. In this period of readjustment after the World War there is no one policy and no series of statutes which can at once bring about normal conditions in a civilization and industrial system as complicated as that of the United States. Patience, sanity, and common sense, as well as forbearance and the spirit of mutual helpfulness, is absolutely necessary to tide over such a situation. Our situation is now showing many marked signs of improvement. There is a better demand for labor. The building trades show a marked increase in activities. Home building, which during the war almost ceased, has been resumed upon a great scale and contracts for new construction have been awarded which amount to billions of dollars in the aggregate. In spite of all the difficulties and trials of the unprecedented conditions through which the country has passed, the United States finds itself in a far better condition than is any other country in the world. The worst is over, and all authorities agree that the signs and indications of a full measure of prosperity are clearly visible.

"An act inaugurating the executive Budget system has been passed. Under the provisions of this act the estimates of money required to run the Government are to be submitted to the President, and by the President to the Congress, and the bills raising revenue are to be based upon the amount recommended by the executive branch of the Government. Heretofore each department has prepared its own estimates and made its own recommendations to Congress, and the appropriation bills for the various departments were prepared by the different committees of Congress without relation to each other and with no system of coordination. This antiquated system resulted in much duplication and expense to the Government. The Budget system will also act as a supervising agency in the interest of unification and coordination. It will tend to centralize the study of our financial requirements and enable one central authority to review the whole system of expenditure and will doubtless result in great economy and consequent reduction in taxation.

"An act consolidating the departments and bureaus engaged in the relief of the disabled veterans of the war was passed, which enabled the veterans to deal with a single agency in securing their relief. This act simplified the entire proceeding of caring for our disabled soldiers and expedited the relief to which they were entitled.

"A new revenue act was passed. Under this act the war revenue acts were completely revised. This act repealed the odious excess-profits tax, the transportation tax, the tax on life insurance premiums, the tax on the parcel post, the tax on the sale of clothing, and many other vexatious and irritating sales taxes. A board for the simplification of taxes was created by this act, and provision was made for the adjustment of uncollected arrears of taxes and for the prevention of retroactive rulings by the department in relation to taxes.

"An act in relation to telephones and cables was adopted.

"An act providing for Federal highways was passed.

"Acts providing for the maintenance of an adequate Army and a sufficient Navy have been passed and all the great appropriation bills for their maintenance have been adopted.

"An act for the reorganization of the Patent Office and for the proper compensation of its officials was passed.

REDUCTION IN EXPENDITURES AND PUBLIC DEBT.

"In striking contrast with the reckless expenditures of the last Democratic administration are the results of the Republican determination to bring the expenditures of the Government down to the lowest possible figure. At the close of the fiscal year on June 30, 1922, the Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, submitted to the House his analysis of Government expenditures. From this expert statement it appears that 'the expenditures for the fiscal year 1919, which was the fiscal year in which the armistice was signed, covering the ordinary expenses of the Government and excluding public-debt retirements, were $18,514,879,955. The expenditures for the fiscal years 1920, 1921, and 1922 (exclusive of public-debt expenditures chargeable to ordinary receipts), on a comparable basis, are as follows:

Fiscal year 1920	$6,403,343,841
Fiscal year 1921	5,115,927,689
Fiscal year 1922	3,372,607,899

"'These figures show a reduction for 1922 under 1920 of $3,030,735,941. They show a reduction for 1922 under 1921 of $1,743,319,789.'

"During the fiscal year just closed on June 30, 1922, the ordinary receipts for the year amounted to $4,109,104,150. The total expenditures, including public-debt items chargeable against ordinary receipts, were $3,795,302,499.

"The surplus for the year is $313,801,651. The total gross debt of the Government on June 30, 1921, was $23,977,450,552. The total gross debt on June 30, 1922, one year later, was $22,963,381,708. The reduction in the debt during the year amounts to $1,014,068,844.

"On May 31, 1919, the total gross debt of the United States was $25,916,874,096. The total gross debt on June 30, 1922, was $22,963,381,708. The reduction of debt during this period is thus seen to amount to $2,953,492,388.

"The reductions in appropriations and consequent reductions in expenditures during the past few years have made possible a most gratifying reduction in taxes. The amount of the reduction for the calendar year 1921 is approximately $80,000,000, and the relief to taxpayers for the calendar year 1922 is estimated by Mr. MADDEN to be not less than $850,000,000.

"As Mr. MADDEN points out in his analysis of governmental financial conditions, 'a complete comparison of the present postwar with any pre-war year is manifestly unfair unless all of the changed economic and political factors are adapted to each period. Nowhere in the United States or abroad are living costs or other economic conditions what they were prior to the war. They never will be in the near future. It is unreasonable to insist that the Government expenses can be brought down precisely to the figures of a period in the past.

"'The real test has been met for comparative purposes if present appropriations are as low as can be consistently made, considering the changed economic and political situation of the country as compared to this situation in the pre-war year. This has been done most satisfactorily. Any comparison of 1923 with a pre-war year must take into consideration these facts arising from war conditions: The interest on the public debt has increased from $23,000,000 annually to $975,000,000; the sinking fund and other public-debt retirement funds have increased from $60,000,000 to $369,000,000; appropriations for pensions have increased from $158,000,000 to $252,000,000; appropriations for the Veteran's Bureau to provide for compensation, vocational training and medical and hospital relief to veterans of the World War amount to $418,000,000, against nothing before the war; the appropriation of $100,000,000 for the Shipping Board is directly due to the war and the chaotic situation in shipping affairs taken over by the present administration on March 4, 1921; the appropriations for the Postal Service have necessarily increased from $324,000,000 to $565,000,000; the entire Internal Revenue Service prior to the war cost about $4,000,000, as against $60,000,000 for the next year, including prohibition enforcement.

"'The Army, while reduced to a pre-war basis of personnel, requires increased appropriations on account of increased pay, transportation, and costs of food and other supplies as compared with the pre-war period. The Navy appropriations are somewhat larger than the pre-war figures, due to the enlarged size of the fleet and consequent increase in the personnel.

"'The Republican Party has made good in its policy of retrenchment and financial reform. It has established an effective Budget system. It promised a reduction in the cost of Government and a reduction in taxation. Both have been effected. The public debt has also been reduced. While other nations are struggling with overwhelming public debts that in some cases are as great or greater than their national wealth and are crying for relief from the taxes caused by deficits in their budgets, the United States has reduced taxation, achieved a surplus in the fiscal year just closed, and is effecting a gradual reduction in the public debt out of current receipts. Such a record is deserving of and will receive the approbation of the American people.

"'The total number of Government employees in the classified civil service, both in and outside of the District of Columbia, aggregated 691,116 on July 31, 1920, the beginning of the fiscal year for which the Republican Congress made appropriations. That number was reduced to 597,482 on July 31, 1921, and further reduced to 568,390 on December 31, 1921, which is the latest date for which figures are available. The total decrease from July 31, 1920, to December 31, 1921, is 122,726.'

REDUCTION IN ESTIMATES AND APPROPRIATIONS, FISCAL YEARS 1920, 1921, AND 1922.

"'Upon assembling in extra session in May, 1919, the new Republican Congress was confronted with the task of passing before the commencement of the new fiscal year on July 1, 1919, eight of the largest of the supply bills which the Democratic Congress had failed to enact into law before it went out of power. Those bills at the time of their failure were all pending in the Senate. The amounts carried in them at the time of their failure aggregated $3,767,975,974. The total of the same eight bills after their reenactment was $2,828,283,432. The first legislative action of the new Congress resulted in the passage of these bills before the fiscal year began and in the decrease of the appropriations proposed by the Democratic Congress for the fiscal year 1920 by $939,692,541.

"'The estimates for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1921, and 1922, respectively, and deficiency estimates for prior years, were prepared by the Wilson administration and submitted to the Republican Congress. The reduction made by the Congress in those estimates aggregate slightly more than $2,950,000,000.

"'The total reductions which the Republican Congress effected in the amounts proposed to it by the Democratic administration for the fiscal years 1920, 1921, and 1922 reach $3,890,000,000, a sum which exceeds by nearly $150,000,000 the total of the appropriations just made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923.

"'In addition to the reductions effected in the estimates of the Democratic administration and the bills of the Democratic Congress, the Republican Congress, in connection with the preparation of the appropriation bills for the fiscal years 1920, 1921, and 1922, also brought about the repeal of appropriations totaling $1,140,000,000.'

"These reductions in appropriations are exceedingly important and should be considered in connection with the reductions in expenditures for these three fiscal years hereinbefore referred to.

"The adoption of the budget system has produced results which are most gratifying. Not only is the estimate for appropriations the coordinated estimate of all the departments considered with relation to each other by the Bureau of the Budget and then approved by the President, thereby insuring a general review of all expenditures by a single commission of experts, but the system is accompanied by a scientific method of auditing and accounting which has hitherto been lacking. Before the adoption of the budget system by the administration of President Harding the great supply bills of the Government were prepared by eight different committees in the House and in the Senate. The amounts appropriated for the various departments and activities of the Government were not all contained in the same bill but were scattered through different bills. It thus became almost impossible to ascertain the expenditures to be charged to each department and to properly check them up. In addition to this difficulty departments and bureaus were continually exceeding the amounts appropriated for their use and relying upon deficiency bills to reimburse the Treasury for the unauthorized expenditures. Under the new system a single committee on appropriations has been created in each branch of Congress which handles all appropriation bills instead of their being scattered in eight separate committees. The appropriations bills have been reorganized and reformed. The new bills carry appropriations for particular departments and other units of governmental activity. All the appropriations for each department are to be found in one bill or part of a bill. The appropriations for the War Department, which were formerly to be found in five different bills, are now segregated in one bill. The new arrangement tends to precision, clarity, and accuracy and has received the commendation of all who have studied the complicated details of governmental appropriations.

"Too much credit for the great work done by the Bureau of the Budget can not be given to its financial director, Gen. Charles G. Dawes, who has just retired, nor to the former Chief of Finance of the War Department, Gen. Herbert M. Lord, who now becomes Director of the Budget.

"As evidence of the marked strides which have been taken in the reduction of appropriations I call attention to a brief table submitted to the Senate by Senator WARREN, of Wyoming, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, on July 12, 1922, which appears on page 10209 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. By this table it appears that the grand total of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, was $18,901,966,814; that for the fiscal year 1919 was $27,072,094,720; that for the fiscal year 1920 was $7,337,597,282; that for the fiscal year 1921 was $4,780,829,510; that for the fiscal year 1922 was $4,066,316,366; that for the fiscal year which will end on June 30, 1923, was $3,747,035,382. Those who are interested in comparison of appropriations for the fiscal years of 1922 and 1923, and for the comparison of the estimates with appropriations for the fiscal year 1923, and for the comparison of the budget estimates and appropriations, supplemental and deficiency for the fiscal year 1922, and the prior fiscal year, and for the recapitulation of comparisons of budget estimates and appropriations will find complete and authoritative tables analyzing the subject in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 12, 1922, on pages 10205 to 10208, submitted to the Senate by the chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

"The Republican Party under the leadership of President Harding was determined to check the waste and extravagance which existed under the Democratic administration during and after the war and has cut the appropriations to the lowest possible amount consistent with the payment of the fixed charges for running the Government, the Army and Navy, and for the payment of the interest on the public debt. It has exercised the utmost economy in appropriations and absolute integrity in expenditure. It is realized everywhere that even with the utmost economy taxes will necessarily remain high for several years to come, but every effort will be made to reduce expenditures and as soon as possible to lighten the burden of taxation.

"I have referred to the fact that there are very definite signs of a great business revival in the near future. There are, however, some clouds still hovering on the industrial horizon.

THE COAL AND RAILROAD STRIKES.

"For several months the miners of coal, both anthracite and bituminous, have been on a strike owing to differences between them and their employers. The direct loss of wages has been stated to be over $400,000,000. The loss involved in the higher price of coal and the indirect loss in many ways is incomparably greater than that and is incapable of exact computation.

"The mills and factories, the locomotives and steamboats, and the individual users of coal have all been caused the greatest inconvenience and damage. The production and distribution of coal lies at the basis of heat, light, and power, of transportation, and the manufacture of commodities.

"After the strike among the coal miners had proceeded for several months, there was superimposed upon it a strike by the railroad shopmen, which at times has threatened to involve the striking of other railway employees, and possibly the calling of a general strike all over the country. The calamity which would be produced by such action staggers the imagination. The entire Nation, men, women, and children, the great mass of them unrelated to the controversy at issue, and entirely innocent of any wrongdoing would, if these strikes were continued into the winter season, be starved and frozen. The families of the striking employees would meet the same fate.

"In the interest of the general public, and for the preservation of society, and, indeed, of civilization itself, some method must be discovered by which differences of opinion between employers and employees can be composed without bringing anarchy and chaos upon the entire country.

"Coal is not only the origin of heat, light, and power, but it furnishes the motive power for our steam-railway transportation. The production and distribution of coal, and the transportation facilities furnished by the railroads must be made continuous. No interruption of either can be tolerated. A solution of this question must, in the interest of humanity and of the perpetuity of our institutions, be discovered. It is perfectly true that a man can not be compelled to work against his will. Every free American has the right to work when he pleases and to quit work when he pleases. This applies to everybody, whether they are members of labor unions or not. The man who is not a member of any labor union has just as much right to work when and where he pleases as a member of a labor union has to quit work when he pleases. Nobody should be allowed to interfere with either in the exercise of this lawful right. Every person has a right to employ other people to guard and protect his property. The outrages perpetrated at Herrin, Ill., where armed mobs of striking miners marched against the property of the operators and attacked those who were there to protect it from violence, and those who had attempted to operate the mines, are a disgrace to the locality where they occurred. Such crimes must be prevented and the criminals who perpetrated them must be punished.

"There is some confusion in the minds of the people as to the powers of the President of the United States in such cases. Under our form of government the authorities of each State have ample power under the law to preserve the peace and to suppress riots and other disorderly assemblages. The President of the United States can not order the Army into a State unless by the request of the governor of the State, except in cases of insurrection and rebellion, or unless it be to prevent a restraint of commerce among the States, or interference with the carrying of the United States mail, which was done in 1894 by President Cleveland during the Chicago strike.

"The States have ample police power to punish crime within their borders, and it is the duty of the State authorities to use all necessary force to maintain order and punish crime. Perhaps no one person is wise enough to state offhand exactly what the terms of the remedy to be applied shall be, but that a remedy must be found is beyond question.

"Coal must be produced without interruption, and the transportation systems of the public must be operated continuously. No differences of opinion beween the owners of these properties and their employees as to hours of labor or rates of wages can be permitted to destroy the business of the country and to bring the innocent people of the country to the brink of famine and death.

"Where a system of coal mines is operated by men who belong to labor unions, who strike en masse when they so vote, or are ordered, and when nonunion men are prevented from taking their places, the public health and safety are imperiled, and the safety of the public must be the supreme law. Where a system of railroads is operated by men who belong to labor unions they no doubt have a right to quit work. When they do so they are no longer in the employ of the railroad company. Having vacated their positions they have no right to prevent others from filling their places.

"Interstate railroads are public-service corporations. They are privately owned but they serve the public, and under the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States they are regulated by laws passed by Congress. Congress prescribes the rates which they may charge, the kind of equipment they may use, the hours during which their employees shall be allowed to labor, the issuance of their securities, the manner in which their books shall be kept, the inspection of their engines, the routing of their freight, the kinds of bills of lading they shall issue, and many other details of the business.

"Congress has created the Interstate Commerce Commission and given it power to make orders in relation to many of these matters. These railroads operate under public charters granted by the several States, and they are public service corporations. It is insufferable and utterly inconsistent with the conduct of the business of the Nation that the operation of these great arteries of travel and commerce should, at a preconcerted signal, come to a stop simultaneously over the entire Nation or any considerable part thereof. The loss and the indirect damage, the physical and mental suffering, the anxiety and hostility which arise from such a proceeding as a strike, involving hundreds of thousands of men and paralyzing the commerce of the country, constitute too great a price to exact from the innocent public for the settlement of a disagreement as to wages or conditions of labor. Some civilized method must be devised by which laboring men who belong to unions may have their differences with their employers adjusted by a peaceful method, as the differences of other people are adjusted. The country will not permit, and ought not to permit, any labor union or any other combination of men to throttle its activities, to decline to submit their differences to arbitration, or to refuse any judicial and orderly settlement of their disagreement.

"If the contention of any leader of a labor union is that he and his union will not permit any tribunal duly constituted by law to decide the matter in dispute; that the dispute must be decided in their favor in accordance with their demands, irrespective of the rest of the country, and regardless of all damage that innocent people may suffer; that they shall be allowed not only to abandon their positions but shall also be allowed to prevent anybody else from filling the positions so vacated; and that they shall be allowed to starve and freeze the country in order to compel their employers to yield to whatever demands the employees may make—then I say this claim can not be allowed. It is an unjust claim, inconsistent with the practices of civilized society, inhuman, cruel, and utterly inconsiderate of the rights of innocent third parties. Whenever this issue is raised it must be squarely met, for the great unorganized mass of the men, women, and children of this free Republic will never accede to any such arrogant claim in the interest of a particular class of people against all the rest of the people.

"The Republican Party stands for equal rights for all men, but conspiracies in restraint of commerce among the States, whether such conspiracies consist in preventing the operation of railroad locomotives or of preventing them from getting coal upon which their operation depends or whether the conspiracies are entered into by capitalists or laborers, must cease. Law and order and the public peace must at all hazards be preserved.

THE SOLDIERS' BONUS.

"Upon nearly every one of the emergencies which have arisen since the last national election, and in respect to nearly every act of any importance which Congress has passed, there have been differences of opinion. Indeed, on many of these questions people of the same political faith have differed violently. The passage of the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill in both Houses of Congress by great majorities is one of such measures. It was not a partisan measure. It was supported by Democrats as well as by Republicans. It was advocated and opposed with equal vehemence. Epithets have been hurled at each other by those taking opposite sides of the question, and a great deal of feeling has been aroused.

"During the last national campaign I announced publicly that I would favor a soldiers' bonus, so called. As a Senator I voted to put this country into the great World War. I voted to conscript the youth of this country into the military service of the United States. I was myself beyond the age of military service, but I voted to draft the boys of the age fixed in the conscription law into the hell of war. They were all liable, upon the commands of their superior officers, to throw themselves against the cold steel, the poison gas, and the flame throwers of the oncoming German host. I voted to drag them away from their ordinary vocations of life, to compel them to abandon their friends and their families, and to fight in foreign lands in the service of their country and for the success of the allied cause. Those who were not drafted stayed at home. Many of them rendered efficient service by producing the things which were necessary to the support of the Army and of the Navy. Many of them made large profits. Wages and prices soared to abnormal heights. Many people reaped the advantage of great profits in safety while our boys were risking their lives and while their families and friends at home were suffering anguish of mind as to their safety. It was the onrush of these gallant soldier boys of ours against the enemy which saved western Europe from the German invasion, and saved the lives and property of the people of this country who remained at home. Having voted to compel these young heroes to fight our battle, I can not find it in my heart to deny them the small tribute to their valor which is provided by the so-called bonus bill. I know that there are plenty of people who say that the country can not stand the financial burdens imposed by the bonus at this time. I think the country can stand it, and I think those who stayed at home and earned money while they compelled their soldier boys to fight their battles in foreign lands for a dollar a day ought to be willing to pay a small additional sum to help start these boys in life again. I am willing to pay my share, and I think in the end other people will see that they ought to be willing to pay theirs.

"In the contest over this matter, much bitter language has been used. Those who favor the measure have been denounced as looters of the Public Treasury and as buyers of votes for themselves with public money. Those who have opposed the measure have been designated as slackers and profiteers who stayed home and got rich out of the war. Neither of these statements made in the heat of the controversy represents the truth. The great mass of the boys who went to war do not consider that they are looting the Public Treasury when they ask the Nation to give them a few hundred dollars each to partially compensate them for the sacrifices which they made. Those who did not have to go to war were not all profiteers nor slackers, but they were not compelled to expose their lives nor to abandon their business, and they ought to be willing to pay a small fractional percentage as the cost of maintaining a successful war, preserving their own property and their own comfort and peace of mind.

THE PROTECTIVE TARIFF BILL.

The adequate protection of American producers and American laboring men from the cheaper-made products and cheaper-paid labor of other countries has been a cardinal principle of the Republican Party since its formation. It has been an issue in almost every national political campaign since the close of the War between the States.

"As I remarked in the beginning of this address, one of the earliest acts of the last Democratic administration after its accession to power in 1913 was to pass the so-called Underwood-Simmons tariff bill. I have alluded to the devastation which the operation of that statute was producing in this country when the outbreak of the great World War took the place of a protective tariff by checking the importation of foreign-made goods into this country and tremendously stimulating the demand for our products by other nations of the world. Now that the war is over and the other nations are recuperating from its effects, many of them with their instrumentalities of production unimpaired but with the lowest wage scale in many years, the danger to our industries, unless they can be protected from the threatened invasion of cheaply made foreign goods, becomes imminent. To be sure, the Congress has passed an emergency tariff bill which affords protection to certain agricultural products, but it gives no protection whatever to the products of our mills and manufactories.

"The Democratic Underwood-Simmons bill still remains unrepealed upon the statute books. This Congress has devoted itself assiduously, and under conditions of the greatest difficulty, caused largely by the depreciated currencies of European competitors and the consequent violent fluctuation in the rates of foreign exchange, to the framing of a Republican tariff bill which would afford adequate protection to our producers and laborers. This bill has been passed by both Houses of Congress and has been sent to a committee of conference between the two Houses for the purpose of agreeing upon the many amendments made to the bill in the Senate. This bill has participated in the violent difference of opinion which has developed, as I have before stated, concerning every major measure which the Congress has passed.

"The great importers of foreign goods make their money not by contributing to produce anything in America but by buying things in foreign countries, importing them into America and trying to induce the American people to buy them in preference to goods the joint product of American labor and American capital. These importers and their customers constitute a very powerful group of rich people in this country, and they make enormous profits out of the business of trying to persuade the American people to use foreign goods instead of those produced in their own country. They have conducted a savage campaign by advertisements in the press and by every method which their large experience suggested to prevent the passage of the pending tariff bill and to cut down to the lowest point the amount of protection afforded. They pretend to be the friend of the American people and claim that they desire to reduce the high cost of living. The fallacy of their whole argument lies in this: Whatever the American people import from foreign countries takes the place of an equal amount of goods made in this country. Of course, everybody would like to buy where they can buy cheapest, but they must also have the money to buy with. If a foreign factory is allowed to put an American factory out of business, not only have those who are thus thrown out of employment lost their income but the chances are that they have got to learn another trade or go into some other business. If any factory or line of factories is put out of business in this country it leaves the foreign factories in the same line of business in complete mastery of the situation. With the American factories out of business, their employees dispersed, and their factories demolished it takes years to reassemble the plants and the operatives and to acquire the necessary skill in the manufacture of the product to start the business again. In the meantime the foreign producer, finding himself master of the situation, immediately elevates his price and is in a position to exact whatever he cares to charge.

"If this process is continued through many industries, we should soon find ourselves reduced to the state of a great nation raising raw materials, shipping them to foreign countries to be manufactured, and paying the foreigner the freight both ways across the ocean and a profit for the manufacture of the goods. We should be raising a few great staple products, we should lose our ingenuity, our talent for invention, and the domestic competition which in the end results in cheaper products and better goods but keeps our own capital and labor employed at home.

"The principle of protection can not be successfully applied as a great national policy and limited to particular spots and particular industries. It must be universal wherever it is applicable at all. Neither the manufacturer nor the laborer who works in a cotton mill can expect to have his product protected, insuring good wages and profits to the business, and at the same time have the products of the woolen mill across the street insufficiently protected. No doubt the man in the cotton mill, being amply protected, would like to buy his woolen clothing as cheap as possible, and would buy a suit of clothes made by cheaper foreign labor and foreign capital, but the men in the woolen industry would not agree to this, and everybody of any common sense realizes that the protective policy resulting in the diversification of industry, making the nation self-reliant and self-supporting, must be applied equally to all.

"No Member of Congress who has been through the experience of framing a protective tariff bill is unfamiliar with the kind of letter which he frequently receives from certain manufacturers demanding adequate protection on what he produces, but stating that he must have the material from which he produces his protected product placed upon the free list. Many of these manufacturers do not seem to realize that the material which he uses in his product is the manufactured product of a mill a few miles distant from him, and if he does realize this he is demanding that his product shall be protected but that the product of his neighbor shall be left exposed to the fiercest competition of the cheap labor of foreign lands. There can be no question that in the long run the diversification of industries, the technical knowledge thus diffused among the artisans of the country, the skill thereby generated among the operatives, and the domestic competition in similar lines of business make a better country, a more intelligent people, a more self-reliant nation, and a more self-supporting country than the policy of free trade which, while it allows everybody to buy where he can buy cheapest, exposes every American to the grilling competition of the underpaid labor of the rest of the world.

"The great majority of the American workers realize that the only possible way of maintaining the American wage scale and the American standard of living is to protect the products of their labor against the competition of the underpaid labor of the Old World. Industrial calamity, bread lines, soup houses, commercial disaster, and panics have always followed the attempt of the Democratic Party to impose free trade or tariff for revenue only upon the American people. Every man who works in a factory knows that he can not be paid the American scale of wages, which constitutes on the average more than 80 per cent of the total cost of the product of the factory in which he works, if some other Americans are allowed to buy articles produced by laborers who are paid from one-tenth to one-half the wages which the American laborer gets. The American laborer knows that no business can pay him the American wage, which enables the American worker to maintain his American standard of living, unless his employer also is making money.

"Capital and employers will not continue to conduct their business at a loss. They can not pay the American scale of wages unless they have the American market. They can not compete with the foreign wage scale and the foreign rate of interest upon capital except in a few industries in which we have a great natural advantage. The American market is the best market in the world. We are 110 millions of the richest people in the world, the most lavish buyers, and the greatest consumers, with the highest standard of living of any people in the whole history of the world.

"We hear a great deal nowadays about encouraging our export trade. No doubt this is a very commendable proposal, but it constitutes only a drop in the bucket in the consideration of the question of American prosperity.

"The sales of goods by American producers in the American market constitute 94 per cent of the total sales of goods by Americans. Only from 6 to 8 per cent of the total sales of goods by Americans have ever been shipped abroad. The prime object of every country in the world is to gain access to the American market, the most profitable in the world, the market of the richest country in the world, the country which maintains by reason of the Republican policy of protection the highest standard of living in the world.

"As the great expounder of the doctrine of protection, William McKinley, used to say, 'Cheap goods make cheap wages, and cheap wages make cheap men.' If you throw the American laborer out of his employment, he is without the price to buy even cheap goods. As McKinley was wont to say, 'I know that when goods are made in America by American capital and American labor and are sold in America we have both the goods and the money for which they were sold. When we buy goods made in Europe by European capital and European labor we get the goods and they get the money.'

"The policy of protection means that before a foreigner can send his goods into this great American market and get the price which similar goods brings in this country he must pay into the United States Treasury a license fee for the privilege of bringing them in. This license fee is, if the two classes of goods are to be placed upon a perfect parity, represented by the difference between the cost of production abroad plus the transportation charge to this country and the cost of producing the similar article in this country, allowance being made for the difference in the rate of profit which is made upon the goods.

"In view of the unstable conditions of foreign exchange, the variation in wages, the difficulty of ascertaining the exact cost of production in foreign countries, and the instability of the different elements involved in the problem, the tariff bill now pending in Congress includes a provision authorizing the President, in his discretion, to change the rates of duties within the range of 50 per cent above or 50 per cent below the rates of duties imposed upon the importation of foreign goods into this country whenever he finds it advisable for the purpose of equalizing the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. By this provision any duties which may prove, owing to the unstable conditions following the war, to be too high as defined in the bill may be reduced by Executive action and duties which prove to be noncompetitive may be raised within the foregoing limitation.

"The Republican Party welcomes the issue raised by the Democratic Party against this protective tariff measure in the coming campaign. It is convinced that the American people are as determined to protect themselves against foreign competition as they ever were, and it feels that the danger of such competition, owing to the low wage scales prevalent in foreign nations and the standard of living which they have been compelled to adopt in order to recoup themselves from the ruinous expenses of the war, render that foreign competition more dangerous than ever.

"It has been stated by some people actuated either by interested or altruistic motives that foreign nations can not pay the debts which they owe us except by exporting their products to this country. I do not know whether foreign nations can pay their debts to us or not. They will probably not be paid for many years in any event; but I do know this, that the American people are not going to lower their wage scale or the American standard of living, tear down their customhouses and throw their ports open to the free admission of foreign goods, and surrender the American market to the foreign competitor and throw the American workmen out of employment and close American industrial plants in order that foreigners who have been engaged in a war which everyone deplores and for which Americans are in no way responsible—I say that I do know America is not going to do these things in order that foreigners might sell their goods here, and the Republican Party welcomes the approaching political campaign upon that issue.

ELECT SENATOR M'LEAN.

"I can not refrain at this time from saying a few words about a very distinguished, a very capable, and yet a very modest friend of ours. I refer to my colleague, Senator GEORGE P. MCLEAN. I have referred to him as a very modest man, and so he is. He does not crave publicity nor applause. With a mind stocked with the learning which he has acquired from a family noted for its scholarly attainments and by his own efforts he has gone about the very responsible business which has devolved upon him as a Senator from Connecticut with unfailing fidelity and with unflagging industry. He is equipped with the rarest intellectual attainments. He knows books, he knows men, and he knows his country and its needs. He is quiet and unobtrusive; he is accurate, discriminating, and courageous.

"I think I may say with entire truth that there is no Senator whose judgment is more sought and none whose conclusions are more sound. He has served the people of his State with signal ability for two terms of six years each in the Senate. He has attained high position and influence there. He is a member of several of the most important committees of that body. He is the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, by which committee the great problems pertaining to the Nation's money and its national banking system and its Federal reserve system are settled. He ranks among the first few members of the Senate Finance Committee, which frames tariff and revenue bills. He is one of the three Republican Senators who are the managers on the part of the Senate of the conference between the two Houses on the pending tariff bill. He is also a member of the conference committee on the soldiers' bonus bill. He ranks high on the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, which has jurisdiction over all interstate railroad questions and of many other questions in relation to interstate commerce.

"Into the work of all these committees, by which so many of the intricate problems involving our commercial, our industrial, and our financial systems are settled, Senator MCLEAN has thrown himself with the most indefatigable industry and zeal. For months several of these committees have been in session from early morning until dark, day after day and month after month, taking testimony, investigating, deliberating, and arriving at decisions upon the most important questions which have ever been before the Nation. He has not spared himself. He has devoted himself conscientiously and exclusively to the interests of his constituents. His correspondence with his constituents, and, indeed, with prominent men all over the country upon these great subjects, has been enormous, and through it all he has been patient, sympathetic, and untiring in his devotion to duty.

"He is to head our State ticket and be our leader in the approaching campaign, and I know that the people of Connecticut, who have so much at stake, will continue to avail themselves of the services of this conspicuously able and conscientious public servant.

THE SUPREME ISSUE.

"I have briefly outlined a few of the accomplishments of President Harding and the Republican Congress in the year and a half during which the Harding administration has been in power. This work has all been accomplished while conditions in the world were almost chaotic and under a continual bombardment of criticism by the Democratic Party and its public press. We do not object to criticism. We realize that this Government must be conducted by parties and parties must be held together by compact and effective organization. Government by political party means a continuous fight to command the confidence of a majority of the electors. The Democratic Party is bound to attack the record of the Republican Party or else make no contest. The largest part of the criticism which is leveled at the splendid achievements of the Republican Party is mere captious criticism. It is not made in good faith. It is hollow sound and fury. It does not ring true. It is made for political effect only. It is an attempt, kept up by the continuous roar of many voices, to confuse the minds of the American voters. The Republican Party has performed a Herculean task. The structure it took over when it ejected the Democratic Party from power resembled a great industrial plant after a conflagration.

"The governmental machinery was warped and twisted to an extent which made efficient operation an impossibility. It had to be readjusted, renewed, and coordinated. The wreckage has been removed as fast as possible, the machinery is now working smoothly, and the plant is on the point of enormous and profitable production. The Harding administration is in the midst of its career. In order that it may justly be held responsible for producing efficient results, it should be given a fair trial. In order that it may have a fair trial, the intricate machinery must be manned and equipped by its friends and not by its enemies. President Harding is the master mechanic. The Senate and the House of Representatives must be coordinated with his plans. To produce efficiency in government, these two branches of Congress must be in complete harmony with the Executive. The House of Representatives must be Republican in order that the Republican Party may be held responsible for the results of the Harding administration at the end of its term of office. To elect a Democratic House of Representatives would be to swap horses while crossing the raging stream. It would effectually block the operation of the governmental machine and nullify the high purposes which the administration has in mind. No doubt a great many Republicans have differed with the administration and with Congress upon particular measures, but because a Republican may not have had his way upon some particular measure which Congress has enacted, or for which President Harding stands sponsor, is that a sufficient reason for putting the Democratic Party in power, with which party such a Republican could not agree on anything? If a Republican thinks a sufficient duty has not been imposed in the tariff bill on some one article, is that any reason for voting for a Democratic candidate for Representative in Congress who does not believe in any protective duty at all? Because some Republican may think that too high a duty has been imposed on some one commodity, can he justify himself in voting for a Democratic candidate for the House of Representatives who will vote only for a tariff for revenue only? After the record which the last Democratic administration made, do the business men of the country desire the Democratic Party to take control of the House of Representatives and its committees which originate and frame all taxation and revenue measures? Whenever the Democratic Party controls the House of Representatives, the Representatives from the Southern States control the Democratic Party and dominate the committees of the House. Do the people of Connecticut desire that the southern Democracy shall control the committees of the House of Representatives in the interest of southern Democratic financial and fiscal theories? Do they desire the terms of financial measures so arranged as to collect the great bulk of the taxes from the Northern, Eastern, and Central States, as was done by the last Democratic administration? I know that they do not. The people of the great business State of Connecticut can be relied upon to support the Republican administration, and, now that it has laid firm the foundations of retrenchment, reform, and orderly progress, the electors of this State will give it a vote of confidence by the return to Washington of five Republican Representatives in the House and by the reelection of GEORGE P. MCLEAN to the United States Senate."

Mr. MCNARY obtained the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. MCNARY. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Oregon for his courtesy.

Mr. President, I wish to make a few, perhaps, unnecessary remarks about the only thing that seems to me to be at work night and day in America. It would appear from reading the daily newspapers that Europe is waiting on her oars while she is attempting to borrow money from somebody somewhere; and in America the workingmen are on strike, and capital would have brought about a lockout if the workingmen had not anticipated it. About the only thing that I can find that is really at work all the time and is, therefore, deserving of some degree of commendation on that account is the cotton boll weevil. I wish to make some remarks about the cotton boll weevil and the effect of his industrious activities.

Seriously, Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the country and of all its industries to the magnitude of this evil. There is too much of a disposition to think that nobody is affected by it except the southern cotton grower, but the whole world is affected by the voracity of this little insect.

Somebody—I have forgotten who—has said that the only thing that man with all his intellect could not face and overcome was the insect world with its germs and its destroyers. This seems to be true about the boll weevil with regard to various American industries which depend upon the production, the transportation, the marketing, the spinning, and the weaving of cotton.

Mr. President, there appears in the Literary Digest of the issue which I obtained this morning, which is dated September 16, an article which is headed "Disastrous Devastations of the Boll Weevil." I wish to bring the facts in that article to the attention of the American people through the medium of this august body. I wish to call the attention of Senators who have been talking a great deal about various things to something that is of importance not only to the man who owns the cotton lands, to the laborers who work them, to the merchant who supplies them, to the bank that loans money to them, to the manufacturer who must spin and weave the cotton, to the laborers in factories whose welfare depends upon the production of cotton, but to the immense mass of consumers whose comfort depends very largely upon comparatively cheap cotton—that is to say, reasonably priced cotton—in the market.

I believe Senators will all bear me out in the statement that I have very seldom made any remarks upon the floor of this House or of the other House concerning anything that was of exclusive importance either to me or to my class or to my section; I have not often done that; but this is a question which goes to the entire country. There is nobody in the United States who is not interested in bringing the entire weight and influence of science and of government to bear to stop the devastations of the cotton boll weevil, if possible.

Mr. President, I am going to read a part of this article, which, as I have stated, is headed "Disastrous Devastations of the Boll Weevil," and comment upon a part of it and try to have it borne in upon the consciousness of the American people through the medium of this body. I quote:

The worst scourge that ever ravaged the South is, in the opinion of many newspapers, being taken altogether too calmly by the country at large. When it dawns on us that the price of cotton and all cotton goods is directly affected, they do not believe we will take it so calmly. Apparently we are already feeding half our shirts to a voracious little beast known as the boll weevil. Last year it destroyed 79 per cent of the cotton growing in the United States. An Associated Press dispatch from Washington on September 3 stated that the Department of Agriculture report for 1921 gives the damage of the boll weevil at 6,277,000 bales of cotton.

Over six and one-quarter million bales of cotton, worth in ordinary times 10 cents a pound, or $50 a bale, and at present worth something like nearer $120 a bale.

This is an increase of damage of 37 per cent over 1920, and the end is not yet. Reports coming in for this year tend to show a considerable increase of damage over 1921. Last month alone—

Last month—one month—

the damage is estimated at 830,000 bales—

Over three-quarters of a million, nearly a million bales of cotton—and if the rate of destruction keeps on going up, it may soon amount to a million bales of cotton a month.

A month! New England labor is dependent upon it; Manchester, England, labor is dependent upon it. England can not pay her debts without her cotton industry.

Since the production of cotton for 1921 was, altogether, some 7,954,000 bales, the boll weevil, with its consumption of over 6,000,000 bales, was even then getting almost as much cotton as we get ourselves. This year, viewing the reported increases of the scourge, it looks to many papers as if we would have to share our cotton crop about half and half with the weevil. Expressed in money, this may easily run to a billion of dollars.

Then the New York Herald adds this, to which I do not entirely agree:

It is not impossible that unless an effective agent against the boll weevil is found the production of cotton in the United States will be completely blotted out.

I do not believe that; the situation is not as bad as that, Mr. President; but it amounts, perhaps, to something worse than that, because a lingering death is frequently worse than a quick death.

Then this article goes on and gives an account of the habits of the boll weevil. I have marked the portions which I desire quoted in the left-hand side of the page with pencil marks. I will not take up the time of the Senate to read them, but will ask the reporter to put them in, including the table on page 10 in the right-hand column.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

What sort of an animal is this "billion-dollar bug," as the Baltimore American calls it? "The weevil," says a report of the United States Chamber of Commerce, "is about one-quarter of an inch in length and an eighth of an inch in width, or about the size of a common house fly. Coming originally to us from a tropical climate, it displays most remarkable adaptations to change of environment. It passes the winter in its adult state, constantly surviving zero weather. During the winter it lives entirely without food, seeking such shelter and protection as are afforded by stored cotton seed, barns, haystacks, fence rows, hedges, brush piles, and the like. The period of hibernation depends upon the weather, and the weevil does not emerge from its hiding place until the young cotton begins to show above ground. The insect then immediately attacks the young cotton for food."

From this report and bulletins of the Department of Agriculture we learn that the weevil has no other food than the cotton plant, and seems to have only two passions—eating and reproduction. There are four or more generations each summer, the length of existence being about 60 days. The greater part of the destruction is accomplished by the larvæ, which are slightly larger than the adults, as can be seen in the illustration. They are fat white maggots, which feed on the internal tissues of the cotton buds and bolls. The possible progeny of a single pair of weevils from the beginning to the end of a season may amount to no less than 12,755,100 descendants. When one remembers that a single weevil, boring into a cotton boll, can destroy it, the ravages of the beast can be understood.

These ravages have mounted year by year, as shown in the attached table, which we take from a recent Associated Press dispatch:

Year.	Weevil damage.	All damage.	Crop produced.
1921	6,277,000	10,712,000	7,954,000

Yearly average	2,214,000	8,416,000	12,358,000

With the boll weevil's past performance in mind, what are we to expect of this year?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President, continuing the quotation, this time from the New York Journal of Commerce, to which I need not pay my compliments as a purely trade and industrial paper, it says:

The almost unparalleled drop of 13.8 per cent in the condition of the cotton crop reported to-day by the Department of Agriculture lowers the estimated yield for 1922 to 10,575,000 bales.

What the midsummer deterioration means in an economic way to the southern planters is manifest, for the reduction in the bales, due to the difference in condition, represents more than $100,000,000 less at the prevailing price of cotton.

Pretty nearly $1 for every man, woman, and child in the United States, whether naturalized or alien.

Detailed reports are beginning to come in. * * * Farmers who a fortnight ago thought they had a good crop see it deteriorating every day. In northern and later parts of the State—

Alabama is the State being referred to—squares are eaten as quickly as they form and the farmers in the earlier sections find weevil pupæ in what appear to be good bolls. To cite an extreme case, on one plantation near the Georgia line in southern Alabama 15 bolls were picked from one stalk. On cutting them open 12 proved ruined by weevils. * * *

Going through fields that from the road look good one will find an unusual shedding of punctured squares. Crack open the bolls and the weevil pupa is pretty sure to be found there, or sometimes a boll worm.

In some cases calcium arsenate has been used with varying success. Some farmers declare it has not done them any good at all.

Mr. President, in that connection I wish to say that I am one of the farmers who is willing to declare that it has not done a particle of good. It has been tried in my neighborhood by some of the more intelligent of the planters; it has been tried in some places on my own plantation, and if it has done any good the good is infinitesimal. One can ride by the cotton fields and note this. Ordinarily in August the cotton fields are white with blossoms every morning—that would have been the case in a normal year under normal conditions—but when I left you could run your eyes down the rows and find perhaps only 5 white blossoms in a row; in other words, the boll weevil had destroyed the squares and where there ought to have been 500 blossoms there were only from 3 to 5 or perhaps 10. Such has been the destruction wrought.

The Agricultural Department has been sending out so-called experts—scientific people. Mr. President, there is hardly anything in the world quite so fictitious as science; novels are not more so. Those experts have been telling the people to do everything in the world almost; they have been trying to find out some other little bug that could eat up this bug, in which effort they have so far failed. They have been trying to get some poison; but what is to be done when the insect to be poisoned is inside the boll or within the calyx of a square or a blossom? You can not get at him, and there you are.

Mr. President, if this had been peach yellows in New England or Delaware or New Jersey, if this had been some disease of citrus fruits out in California, the whole Government would have subordinated nearly everything else to the destruction of the pest; but the idea has gone abroad that the man who suffers by it is the cotton planter. Why, bless your hearts, I do not suffer alone by a market price of 20 cents for cotton when I am raising one-fifth of what I could have raised at 10 cents; everybody suffers.

The merchant in my neighborhood, the banker who lends money to the merchant, the lawyer who must look to the cotton crop to enable his clients to get money enough with which to pay him, the people of New England, who are spinning and weaving cotton, and other industries all over the United States which are more or less dependent upon the prosperity of the textile industry, whether directly engaged in it or not, all suffer; in fact, nearly everybody suffers. Cotton has been for many years the great export crop of America, and it has restored to us the balance of trade when otherwise it would have been lost. It has maintained it nearly all the time. This is not a mere State question. It is in the very highest sense a national question. It is not a sectional question. It is not a question of one industry; it is a question that concerns all industries in this country.

Then I notice this:

In general, its use—

The use of this chemical—has not given the satisfaction that it has in Mississippi, particularly the Delta, where its use has meant nearly perfect weevil control.

That statement is absolutely inaccurate. Except that, of course, it is not designedly so, I would say it was false. I know a good deal about the Mississippi Delta, and that statement is not true.

Farmers in this zone were heavy losers last year; as, for example, one planter put out 500 acres and picked 2 bales.

On that 500 acres, in an average year, he ought to pick 300 bales. On that 500 acres, in a good crop year, with a bumper crop, he might have picked 500 bales, but he picked 2 bales.

They are so discouraged this year that they talk of turning to other crops. In fact, one county that normally plants 50,000 acres this year has but 2,500. The county in 1919 produced 17,000 bales of cotton, and last season 298. * * *

All estimates of numbers of bales must be taken with caution, because the weevils are working in the bolls, and therefore are hidden from view. Not until the cotton is picked will the damage be capable of appraisement.

And, by the way, in that connection, Mr. President, appraisement is then too late, because after the cotton is picked and has gone to the gin, and the prices have been fixed upon the market upon a certain expectation, the failure to realize the expectation comes too late to give the laborer who works for the planter and who has been paid by the planter at market prices prior to that, any relief. The planter may save himself, but the laborer can not.

Concerning South Carolina, the article says:

The boll weevils are now at work all over the State. So long as there are squares they confine their attention to them. But all the squares are gone, and they now are working in the bolls of not only the middle, but bottom growth, where the bolls are older.

Mr. President, cotton grows in my section of the country about 5 feet high, let us say. In various sections it will grow about 2 feet high. The land has upon it what is called a bottom crop, a middle crop, and a top crop. We can manage to get the bottom crop, which comes first, in hard bolls before the weevil is sufficiently developed to attack them; and in a real good year for us, and a bad year for the boll weevel, we may develop a majority of the middle crop to a hardness of boll where it is impervious to the attack of the boll weevil; but the top crop has to go, and part of the middle crop or all of it, this year has gone. As the article says, these boll weevils, as long as they can get squares on the cotton to feed upon, do not attack the boll at all. That part of it which has been developed into hardened boll escapes them then; but later on, when they have destroyed all the squares—as is the case with the fields which I described, where there were no blooms, showing that the squares had gone—then they attack the tender bolls, and then the medium hard bolls, and the only thing that escapes is the boll that has been thoroughly developed before they were hatched out.

When bolls are full grown they begin to get specked with red spots. I have found weevils in those red bolls. I picked one ball and found nine punctures in it. That means that nine weevil eggs were incubating in that one boll. I haven't seen so poor a crop in 20 years.

From other States the story is almost the same. "Mississippi," they say, "is credited with a crop of 1,003,000 bales." But—

"The weevils are much worse than ever before. Only a small percentage of farmers are fighting them, and they are consuming the green bolls. No one can tell from the appearance of a field what it is like. Only the picking test will prove it."

I want to call your attention to this, which sums up the entire situation:

There never can be another large crop of cotton produced under what have up to now been considered ordinary conditions. * * * Consumption of cotton is increasing. Last year it was from 25 per cent to 30 per cent more than the present crop will amount to.

Think of that! That pretty nearly spells a cotton famine. That does not mean so much to me as it does to the consumers of the world. I am partly recompensed for the scarcity of supply, the failure of the crop, by the increase in price; but the man who must buy coats and pants and vests and hats and shirts and underclothing made out of cotton entirely, or to a very large extent, can not recompense himself. He must pay the additional price; and that means more for some other parts of the world than it does for America, because when you go to India and when you go to Egypt you find people clothed nearly entirely in cotton. When you go to central Africa and northern Africa the same thing is true. No greater calamity can happen to the world than really expensive cotton clothing, whether calicoes for women, or shirtings for men, or sheetings for beds.

Production of cotton is not keeping pace—

Nor can it keep pace under boll weevil conditions—and this is a situation the market must recognize.

There is only one way to meet an unpleasant situation. We must find the remedy.

Can we find the remedy? Is science capable of it? Is the Agricultural Department—which, at any rate, makes great pretense of wrestling with every great agricultural problem—capable of it? Is it doing the very best that it can toward that end? All those are questions which I leave unanswered for each man who reads what I have to say to answer in his own way, to the best of his ability.

There is a remedy which was suggested by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] the other day, which is to stop the production of cotton entirely for one year. That would stop the boll weevil. There is not any doubt about that, because scientific information is unanimous at least upon one point, and that is to the effect that this miserable little rascal does not eat anything except cotton, the cotton plant, the squares, the blooms even at times, the tender bolls, and he can not live a whole year without food. He can live all winter. He hides in the hedges, he gets in the trash, he goes into a comatose condition, he does not wake up until the next spring wakes him up, but in the summertime he must eat. But, Mr. President, there are remedies offered for diseases that take account of everything except the chief factor, and the chief factor is human nature. How could you possibly, by agreement or by a law, effect a condition of things whereby for 12 months no cotton should be raised? If every man who made cotton in all the South came up and signed an agreement not to plant one seed for the next year, how many of them do you suppose would keep the agreement? There would be a little smart Aleck in this neighborhood, and another one there, who would say, "Nobody is going to raise cotton except me, and it will be worth a dollar and a half a pound, and even if the boll weevil eats up nine-tenths of it, my other tenth will make me rich." You can not leave human nature out of the consideration of any great problem. There is your human nature—greedy, selfish; not compact keeping, either nationally or internationally, or individually; not universally so.

Then, in the name of God, by what sort of a law could you enforce the nonproduction of cotton? Certainly the Federal Government has no authority to say to the Senator from Alabama that in his State all shall not plant any cotton. Under no delegated authority of any description and under no possible inference from any delegated authority has the Federal Government any such power as that. Could the States do it? Yes; if they all did it and did it in the same year and did it at the same time and by identical provisions, and in addition to that made it a crime punishable by such stupendous penalties as to enforce it; but everybody knows that they are not going to do it. There is not a State in the South whose legislature would dare pass a law of that description, no matter how advantageous it would be.

Then if you can not effect it by agreement and if you can not effect it by law you are back where you were. You must rely upon modern science and upon the investigating power of the Federal Government and its advisory power in teaching the farmer what to do and how to do it.

So far, I am sorry to say, the Agricultural Department has fallen down. If it has done any good at all, the good has been almost infinitesimal. It has done this amount of good: It has taught everybody in my country, where we have had the boll weevil now for six or eight years, and in all the boll-weevil section to plant early-maturing varieties of cotton, to stimulate the soil highly, to work it rapidly, and to make the crop come up as soon as possible, so as to get as many bolls as possible too hard for the boll weevil by the time the boll weevil shall come. Further than that, not a particle of good has been done by any so-called scientist or any suggestion he has made.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, is the Senator from Mississippi certain that the boll weevil, if deprived of cotton as food, would not find some other leaf upon which he would subsist?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, scientists are never unanimous. They are like lawyers. As I said a moment ago, science is highly fictitious, and the science of to-day six months from now is set aside by scientists as out of date; but up to date the agreement is unanimous that this particular boll weevil—the Mexican boll weevil, we first called him, because he came up from the cotton country of northern Mexico, where cotton grows wild, by the way—that this particular bug does not eat anything except the cotton plant and its fruit. Whether that is a truth or not, I do not know.

Mr. McLEAN. He prefers cotton?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They do not say he prefers cotton; they say he does not eat anything else.

Mr. McLEAN. Is the Senator sure he would not find wild cotton, for instance, upon which he could live through the summer?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I am not sure. These people who pretend to know, and say they do know, are sure; at least, they say they are sure, and I suppose they are right about it. At any rate, the animal came to us from the wild-cotton country of Mexico, and the first time he crossed the Rio Grande he came into the State of Texas, I believe, down about the mouth of the Brazos River, and from that he has spread northward and eastward until last year he was invading the highlands of South Carolina and a good deal of North Carolina. I suppose they are right in thinking that he eats nothing but the fruit of the cotton plant.

When he lives in a country where cotton grows wild, of course even stopping the cultivation of cotton would not put an end to the boll weevil, but if we once get him back across the Rio Grande I dare say we could handle him. But there is no practicalness in the suggestion of stopping the cultivation of cotton for a year, because there is no way of either passing an edict to that effect or of enforcing the edict if it were passed. I have tried to show that the difficulty could not be handled by agreement, and nearly everybody, whether a lawyer or not, knows that it would be impracticable to try to control it by law. You would first have to get the legislators of the several States to consent to pass such laws, which they would not do, and then you would have to get the people to consent to the enforcement of the laws if the legislatures passed the laws, which a great many of them would not do.

They would rise in rebellion in many points of the country rather than to have even the States, much less the Federal Government, tell them what they should plant on their farms. This I want to read because it is eminently true:

> It is not a local matter, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] went on to say. It has become a national menace, and we have to meet it, not with experiments here or rotation of crops there, but with the only method indicated, a cessation of the planting of cotton for one year.

Mr. President, that is all my friend from South Carolina can suggest as the remedy, and I have shown that that remedy is unworkable, impracticable, impossible.

There is another remedy, and that is for the so-called experts, the so-called scientists, to get to work at the problem more intelligently than hitherto, and if those in office now are incapable of it, to put somebody in their places who shall be capable of it. It is idle to tell me that in the twentieth century a little bug that feeds on cotton can defeat the civilization and the science and the intelligence of the world. I furthermore believe that a good result would be accomplished if the Government were to offer a large sum of money to people outside who would invent or discover methods of killing or even of hindering the boll weevil.

I just wanted to make these few remarks. I may be criticized because the raising of cotton is my own fundamental industry and that of my people, but I would not advocate remedial measures if the benefit on the one side or the injury on the other side were confined to me or to them. But, as the Senator from South Carolina said, it is a national menace, and the Senator did not go far enough. It is a world menace. If the poor people of Russia and India and Asia Minor and Africa and China can not be clothed cheaply—and cotton is the only thing with which they can be clothed cheaply—then it means unrest, dissatisfaction, lawlessness, revolt, chaos, in very many parts of the world. It does look curious, does it not, to think that a little bug, which is just about the size of an ordinary house fly, could, if left unhampered, revolutionize the earth and its ways of living and clothing itself? But that bug can do it if you leave him to go unhampered and unhindered.

Mr BORAH. Mr. President, I did not understand the suggestion which the Senator made as to how to deal with this situation, and what is the remedy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have said that I saw no remedy for it at all except for the scientists of this age to discover either some bug which would feed upon that bug or some way of putting an end to him by poison or otherwise, and I said that so far that had not been done, and that I thought that if it had been a thing which primarily concerned some other section of the country rather than the South a method would have been found by now.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a day or two ago, in discussing this subject, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] said that in his opinion, as I understood him, the only way to deal with the subject is to alternate crops.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I spent about 10 or 15 minutes telling why that is impracticable.

Mr. KING. I was called out of the Chamber.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said you could not do it by agreement, because if people made agreements they would not keep them. Secondly, that you could not do it by the action of the Federal Government, because there was no authority; and that you could not do it by State authority, because the State legislators would fail to do it because of fear of failure of reelection at the hands of those who would object to it. So there you are.

GRAIN FUTURE EXCHANGES.

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 11843, known as the grain futures trading act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill be reported first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator want the bill read in full?

Mr. SMOOT. I think it ought to be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the bill.

The bill was read by title, as follows:

> H. R. 11843. An act for the prevention and removal of obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in grain, by regulating transactions on grain future exchanges, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

THE TARIFF—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before proceeding to the consideration of House bill 11843, the Chair lays before the Senate the following notice from the House of Representatives, which the Secretary will read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
September 13, 1922.

The House has passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the conference report on the bill (H. R. 7456) entitled 'An act to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes,' be recommitted to the committee of conference, with instructions to the House conferees to agree to the Senate amendments putting fertilizer potash on the free list, and to strike out the provision containing the dye embargo."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I understand that this is nothing but a notice given to the Senate of what the House has done, namely, that it has instructed its conferees in a certain way. The Senate conferees have as yet made no report to the Senate. Therefore I presume it is not necessary for the Senate to take any action because the House has not asked for any action on the part of the Senate, but has simply stated what it has done; that it has refused to accept the report of the conferees, and has instructed its conferees in a certain manner. Nevertheless, I would be glad to have the view of the Chair as to whether any action is necessary on the part of the Senate with respect to the notice sent over by the House.

Mr. MOSES. May I ask the Senator from North Dakota if his theory is that, inasmuch as the conference report has not been presented to the Senate, the conference is still alive so far as the Senate is concerned, and that under the action of the House the conferees will simply meet for the purpose of conforming to the instructions of the House, and that then a report will be made to the Senate?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is my understanding that the Senate and the House conferees will meet immediately again to consider the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, nothing done now by the Senate in recognition of the action of the House would prevent any point of order on anything being made when the conference report comes up after the House shall have acted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that if the Senate takes no action whatever it will not preclude any point of order which may be made on the report of the conference committee when it does come in.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad to hear the Chair make that statement, and I do not see how he could reach any other conclusion. But evidently this matter has no business before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Inasmuch as the action of the House has not changed the conference from a free conference into an instructed one and inasmuch as the report of the conferees on the part of the Senate has not been presented, the Chair is of opinion that the matter is still in conference and that the Senate conferees can meet with the House conferees and continue their deliberations.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. When the conferees make their report, will it go to the House first or come to the Senate first?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the understanding of the Chair that the House granted the conference, that the papers are therefore with the House, and that the report must be first made and first acted upon in the House.

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to propound another parliamentary inquiry. Would it be permissible, when the report is presented to the Senate, for the Senate to give instructions to the Senate conferees to do certain things?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not inclined to make a ruling upon that point at this time, and not until it arises.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, one observation made by the Chair I hope was an inadvertence, but if not inadvertent I would like to express my dissent from the view, namely, that the action of the House, as I understood the Chair, does not constitute any limitation upon the conferees or put the conference in a different category from that of a free conference. I submit that the instruction of the House was a limitation and does not leave the conferees absolutely free, as I understood the Chair to state.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the contrary opinion. The action of the House instructed the House conferees to agree to the Senate amendments with regard to potash and directed the House conferees to disregard the embargo with regard to dyes. The Chair is of the opinion that that leaves the conference a free conference so far as the Senate is concerned.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber when the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] made his statement about this matter, and I do not know what his statement was; but I have been under the impression, and I think it has been the practice, that when conferees make a report to the two Houses, their functions are at an end. The House conferees have made their report to the House.

Mr. MOSES. I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina, who is one of the conferees, whether any statement has been made on the part of the Senate conferees.

Mr. SIMMONS. No statement has been made, but the report has been signed by a majority of the Senate conferees, although it has not been presented to the Senate.

Mr. MOSES. I have read the statement of the managers on the part of the House. I have seen no statement presented by the managers on the part of the Senate, and no report has been submitted by the Senate conferees. It seems to me, so far as the Senate conferees are concerned, that they are still functioning.

Mr. SIMMONS. Possibly that is true as to the Senate conferees, but as to the House conferees the report has been made and their functions are at an end.

Mr. MOSES. Were not those functions revived by the order to recommit?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I do not think so. I think the practice has been that when a conference report is recommitted, new conferees are appointed.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that each House must determine that for itself. The Senate has no control over what the House may do with reference to its own conferees. When the House sends the matter back to the same conferees, as it has done in this instance, it is not within the power of the Senate to question the action of the House with reference to its conferees or its rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no question before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. The suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota does not reach the point I have in mind at all. The question I have in mind is, unless new conferees are appointed, whether the action of the conferees will not be limited to the two matters about which they are instructed. What I desire is that the new conference shall be unlimited in the scope of their powers and actions. Anything that interferes with that limits them to the two matters about which they have been instructed. I wish the effect of it to be clearly understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is quite obvious that the House did not regard it necessary to appoint new conferees. The House simply recommitted the report of the conferees to the committee on conference. There is no question before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Chair to hold that the new conference will be free and full, and not limited to the two matters about which the House has instructed its conferees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House has not asked the Senate to agree to a further conference. It has simply notified the Senate that it has recommitted to the conferees the tariff bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, it seems to me very clear that when the conferees made a full and complete report to the House, that that discharged the conference committee That would be the case undoubtedly if the Senate conferees had had charge of the papers and had brought them to the Senate and had made a full and complete report, because that is the way in which conferees are discharged. It is not done by formal action of the Houses unless for some reason the House discharge them, but by the conclusion of their duties, to wit, the making of a complete report. There may be precedents for this action. I have never known before of a conference report recommitted by one House to the conference committee after a complete and full report but that the result in the end amounted to a rejection of the conference report. That was the action of the House. It rejected the conference report.

If the Senate had rejected the conference report instead of the House, what would have been the parliamentary situation? The action of the conferees would have failed and the Senate would have asked for a new conference and new conferees would have been appointed. It seems to me the action of the House is the same, and that they rejected the conference report. There is no other conclusion to which we can come. They refused to adopt the report. They said they would not adopt it, because they disagreed to two items, and that was a rejection of the report. Of course, the House did not take this action, I assume, because they wanted to retain the papers. If they had rejected the conference report and asked for another conference, the papers would have been sent to the Senate and then the Senate would have had control of the matter. But instead of rejecting the conference report and sending the papers back here, as is usual, they merely made a motion to recommit the bill to the conferees, which amounts to a rejection.

I have no desire to delay the case. I suppose, as the Chair said, there is no action to be taken and there is nothing before the Senate except the notice that was sent over here this morning. If the Senate conferees go back, I assume they go back to a free and open conference. If they do not go back to a free and open conference, then there may be some question raised when the conference report comes back to the Senate again, if it ever does. If there is a free and open conference, I can see no objection to this way of backing into the conference instead of going in the direct method. But if it is intended by this backing into the conference to attempt to foreclose other questions, then I think there will be some very material questions raised about the method, if the bill ever comes back to this body, because there are some changes which have been made outside of the items eliminated by the House which in my judgment it was entirely beyond the jurisdiction of the conferees to act upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama was not in the Chamber when the Chair announced its opinion with respect to the matter. The Chair is of the opinion that so far as the Senate is concerned the character of the conference has not been changed by the action of the House, inasmuch as the House directed its conferees to accept the amendments made by the Senate upon one subject. With regard to the embargo, the Chair is of the opinion that it is a free conference upon the part of both the House and the Senate. But the Chair does not desire to foreshadow what its judgment would be with respect to any point of order that may be hereafter made upon the report of the conference committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not objecting in any way to the action of the House in rejecting the embargo or the action of the conferees in reference to the duty on potash, because I am in hearty accord with the action taken by the House in both instances. But there are other matters in the bill, and material matters, which I think indicate that the conferees have exceeded their authority. I do not want anything to be foreclosed. But if there is no action by the Senate and the conferees are allowed to take their own responsibility in going back to conference, there is nothing more to be said.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair ventured to give an opinion with regard to action on the part of the Senate in view of the notice given by the House, but desires to remind the Senate that there has been no action proposed by any Senator on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to propound an inquiry to the Senator from Alabama, for whose opinion I have great respect. I understood him to say that it is his view that this bill be a free and open conference. How can that be when the Senate has passed the bill, the House has passed the bill, and the conferees have agreed; then when the conferees reported to the House, the House instructed its conferees to agree to the two matters upon which the Senate has taken action, the embargo and potash provisions. Why does not that close it? I do not see how it could be a free and open conference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not express myself very clearly. Of course, what I meant was that the conference should be a free and open conference in regard to all other matters except the two in which the House conferees were instructed. I recognize and everybody recognizes that when one of the Houses of Congress by final action instructs its conferees in regard to certain matters the conferees are bound. So far as I am concerned, of course, if the Senate as a body decided to object to going into conference with those instructions it could do so. I have no objection to the Senate conferees going back with that limitation, because my viewpoint is the same as the House on those two items, but what I wanted to have clearly in my mind is that this is an open conference in regard to all other matters.

Mr. WILLIS. What other matters are in conference? There has been an agreement as to everything else.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course there is a report filed and it has gone out. It has ended. The same conferees may write the same report when they go back to conference, but I want it understood that it is an open conference and that it is a new report that is being presented, because I do not want any rights on points of order to be waived. That is what I have in mind.

Mr. MOSES. That may not be done. There is no right to foreclose any points of order in that way.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course there is no action. If we had accepted the action of the House, we might have foreclosed some action.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think, without question, the conferees on the part of the Senate agree that they go back to an open conference, and while the House instructs upon certain matters it does not preclude the reconsideration of every other matter.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no question before the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. I move that the conferees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the tariff bill, House bill 7456, be instructed to adhere to amendment numbered 914, being paragraph 901, the same being the amendment relating to cotton.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I make the point of order——

Mr. ASHURST. I had not finished my sentence——

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator has not completed his sentence, I shall wait until he does so.

Mr. ASHURST. I hope the Senator, like certain classes of people, will not object to long sentences, because I may use long sentences.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply want to make the objection that the papers in this case are not before the Senate at all. They are with the House conferees at the present time, and therefore it is out of order to give the Senate conferees any instructions at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A point of order has been made and the point of order is not debatable. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ASHURST. I desire to be recognized.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Allow the Chair to state the reason why the point of order is sustained. It is because there was laid before the Senate merely the notice from the House with regard to its action on the conference report upon the tariff bill, but there is before the Senate what is known as the grain futures bill.

Mr. ASHURST. I made a motion a moment ago, against which a point of order was interposed, that the Senate conferees be instructed to adhere to the amendment numbered 914 regarding long-staple cotton. That motion was drawn from me by the correct observation of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. The Senator from North Dakota wisely observed, as a member of the conference on the part of the Senate, that when the bill went back to conference each and every item would be before the conferees. The Senator is correct. It was the proper and exact expression that I would expect from a Senator who had his wealth of information. I have examined the precedents, and there are many precedents supporting the ruling of the Chair, although there are some to the reverse.

In fairness, however, to the Chair, I am bound to say that the latest expression is in accordance with the ruling which the Chair has just rendered. I wish, however, to avail myself of the right under the rules to say what I would have done and said had my motion been in order.

It will be remembered that in August the Senate, by a roll call showing a majority of over 2 to 1, placed a duty of 7 cents a pound upon cotton having a length of fiber of 1§ inches, and that later when the bill left the Committee of the Whole and went into the Senate, while there was no roll call there was a viva voce vote and the Senate agreed to that amendment.

I am receiving telegrams from the leading citizens of Arizona and from many citizens of California asking me if it could be possible that the Associated Press had conveyed the correct information when it announced that the Senate conferees had receded on that amendment. I have been asked what has caused a Republican Senate and a Republican House to recede from and abandon this amendment, to which the Republican Party was in faith and in honor pledged to adhere. I have telegraphed in reply that the conferees met in secret session, the doors closed, the members of the press excluded, and that the secret as to what caused the conferees to recede and thus place cotton on the free list is locked within their bosoms.

I would not, of course, expect the Senate conferees to go to the extent of defeating their bill in order to save this item, but I do feel that they should have made a more stubborn resistance to the overtures of the House conferees; in other words, the Senate conferees were invertebrate on this item; they lacked what in common parlance is called "backbone." I believe they should, when they go into a further full and free conference, take up this amendment and see to it that the House recedes.

It is due to the Senate, it is due to all parliamentary procedure, that the Senate conferees should longer insist upon this amendment. I do not know how long they did insist, but I believe that it is a part and parcel of their duty still further to insist upon the Senate amendment which I have described as No. 914.

If it is not an improper procedure, and if it is not offensive, I will ask the Senators composing the conferees on the part of the Senate if, in their judgment, it is at all possible for them to induce the conferees on the part of the House of Representatives to yield on that amendment? I have made the only motion that it is within the power of a Senator to make, and the Chair has held my motion to be out of order. The only thing I may do now—and I embrace the opportunity—is to ask the Senator from Utah if he can not give us some hope that when the bill again goes to conference the amendment will be adhered to? Can the Senator give me any information?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course I can not speak for the House conferees, as the Senator knows, but, unless they have been presented with some reasons other than those offered to them previously why the duty referred to by the Senator from Arizona should be retained, I would not want to hold out any hope to the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I hammered on the doors of the conference committee, but no Senator was admitted. I think the conferees should have admitted Senators who desired to make arguments. However, the Senator from Utah himself and a member of the House conferees came to the door and were willing to receive such papers as I deemed proper to present in the way of telegrams and letters, and for that courtesy I am grateful; but I have a right to assume that the House conferees read the debates in the Senate, and nothing more can be said than has been said by my colleague [Mr. CAMERON] and myself.

The Republican orators and Republican press during the 1920 campaign pledged themselves and their party to place a duty on this cotton, and they should keep their word.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the Senate conferees could not have their way in every case. If the Senator will notice the conference report he will ascertain that the Senate conferees did have to yield as to a few points, but in the great majority of instances the House conferees yielded to the amendments made by the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. We have heard speeches from the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] regarding deflation. In the campaign of 1920—and I do not like to inject partisan matters here—the Republicans promised that if they elected a majority of the two Houses of Congress and elected the President a duty would be imposed on long-fiber cotton. The Republicans captured both Houses of Congress and the Presidency, and should keep such promises. These promises stimulated the cotton growers to plant additional acreage in Arizona and in the cotton-producing counties of California. But when the cotton picking and the ginning is about to commence the Republican Party turns to free trade and deflates the cotton grower.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want the Senator from Arizona to remember that when this amendment was put upon the bill there were very few Senators upon the Democratic side who voted for it.

Mr. ASHURST. But I voted for it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Arizona voted for it, with a great many other things carrying a reasonable duty, and some that were exceedingly high, I thought. I do not think any politics can be made out of this thing at all.

Mr. ASHURST. I hope not. I am not trying to.

Mr. SMOOT. The votes that put it on the bill in the Senate were Republican votes, and we believe in protection. In the conference the House conferees felt that for the amount of long-staple cotton raised in the United States they were not justified in putting a duty of 10 cents a pound upon the hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of cotton cloths that would have to pay the duty if this rate of duty was put upon long-staple cotton. The Senator knows that we gave a compensatory duty wherever it was used, beginning with the yarn and ending with the cloth.

The Senate conferees may not have very much backbone, Mr. President, but I want to say to the Senator that this was one of the last things that was given up, and there never was a conference committee of the House and the Senate appointed to consider the great number of amendments contained in any tariff bill but that there had to be yielding on both sides.

I do not know that it is necessary to say anything more than that, Mr. President. The report was made, and that is about all I can say as to the result of the conference.

GRAIN-FUTURE EXCHANGES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11843) for the prevention and removal of obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in grain, by regulating transactions on grain-future exchanges, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, with amendments.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I hope we may now proceed with the consideration of House bill 11843.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I was about to make a parliamentary inquiry as to whether the bill was before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). House bill 11843 has been laid before the Senate and is now before the Senate.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McNARY. I yield for a question only.

Mr. MOSES. Inasmuch as the bill is regularly before the Senate, I wished to follow the Senator from Arizona and the Senator from Utah in a brief discussion of the tariff bill.

Mr. McNARY. I refuse to yield.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I simply wish to say to the Senator from Oregon that I do not want to interrupt the continuity of consideration of his bill when it is once seriously taken up, but I should like to occupy about five minutes now, so that the consideration of the bill will not be further interrupted as the day goes on.

Mr. McNARY. I should like very much indeed to accommodate my excellent friend from New Hampshire, but I must refuse absolutely to yield to anyone for any purpose. This is a very important measure.

Mr. MOSES. May I ask the Senator if he contemplates holding the floor continuously through the day?

Mr. McNARY. I think the bill will pass within 10 minutes, and I shall subside at that time.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, it is the intention to ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate as soon as this measure is acted upon.

Mr. MOSES. Of course, I know that the Senate will await with great emotion what I have to say, but in view of the rigorous manner in which the Senator from Oregon retains the floor I shall have to deprive the Senate of the privilege for some time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the first amendment of the committee.

The first amendment was, in section 3, page 3, line 17, after the word "as," to strike out "'options' or"; in line 22, after the word "prices," to strike out "of" and insert "involved in"; on page 4, line 1, after the word "thereof," to insert "and to facilitate the movements thereof"; in line 4, after the word "products," to insert "and by-products"; in line 6, after the word "possible," to strike out "losses" and insert "loss"; in the same line, after the word "in," to strike out "prices" and insert "price"; in line 7, after the word "transactions," to insert "and prices of grain"; in line 8, after the word "boards," to insert "of trade"; in the same line, after the word "are," to strike out "extremely"; in line 14, after the word "commerce," to strike out "and make such business unsafe and uncertain from time to time," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. Transactions in grain involving the sale thereof for future delivery as commonly conducted on boards of trade and known as "futures" are affected with a national public interest; that such transactions are carried on in large volume by the public generally and by persons engaged in the business of buying and selling grain and the products and by-products thereof in interstate commerce; that the prices involved in such transactions are generally quoted and disseminated throughout the United States and in foreign countries as a basis for determining the prices to the producer and the consumer of grain and the products and by-products thereof and to facilitate the movements thereof in interstate commerce; that such transactions are utilized by shippers, dealers, millers, and others engaged in handling grain and the products and by-products thereof in interstate commerce as a means of hedging themselves against possible loss through fluctuations in price; that the transactions and prices of grain on such boards of trade are susceptible to speculation, manipulation, and control, and sudden or unreasonable fluctuations in the prices thereof frequently occur as a result of such speculation, manipulation, or control, which are detrimental to the producer or the consumer and the persons handling grain and products and by-products thereof in interstate commerce; and that such fluctuations in prices are an obstruction to and a burden upon interstate commerce in grain and the products and by-products thereof and render regulation imperative for the protection of such commerce and the national public interest therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 5, line 21, after the word "a," to strike out "memorandum" and insert "record"; and, in line 24, after the word "such," to strike out "memorandum" and insert "record," so as to read:

(b) Where such contract is made by or through a member of a board of trade which has been designated by the Secretary of Agriculture as a "contract market," as hereinafter provided, and if such contract is evidenced by a record in writing which shows the date, the parties to such contract and their addresses, the property covered and its price, and the terms of delivery: Provided, That each board member shall keep such record for a period of three years from the date thereof, or for a longer period if the Secretary of Agriculture shall so direct, which record shall at all times be open to the inspection of any representative of the United States Department of Agriculture or the United States Department of Justice.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 7, line 20, after the word "dissemination," to strike out "through the mails or in interstate commerce by telegraph, telephone, wireless, or other means of communication"; in line 23, after the word "false," to strike out the comma and the word "or"; in the same line, after the word "misleading," to strike out the comma; and in the same line, after the word "or," to insert "knowingly," so as to make the paragraph read:

(c) When the governing board thereof provides for the prevention of dissemination by the board or any member thereof, of false or misleading or knowingly inaccurate reports concerning crop or market information or conditions that affect or tend to affect the price of grain in interstate commerce.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 3, to strike out:

(e) When the governing board thereof admits to membership in and all privileges on such board of trade, under such terms and conditions as may be imposed lawfully on other members of such board, any duly authorized representative of any lawfully formed and conducted cooperative association of producers having adequate financial responsibility which is engaged in cash grain business in interstate commerce: Provided, That no rule of a contract market against rebating commissions shall apply to the distribution of excess earnings among the bona fide members of any such cooperative association.

And to insert:

(e) When the governing board thereof does not exclude from membership in, and all privileges on, such board of trade, any duly authorized representative of any lawfully formed and conducted cooperative association of producers having adequate financial responsibility which is engaged in cash grain business, if such association has complied, and agrees to comply, with such terms and conditions as are or may be imposed lawfully on other members of such board: Provided, That no rule of a contract market shall forbid or be construed to forbid the return on a patronage basis by such cooperative association to its bona fide members of moneys collected in excess of the expense of conducting the business of such association.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, page 15, line 19, after the word "a," to strike out "memorandum" and insert "record"; in line 23, after the word "false," to strike out the comma and insert "or"; in the same line, after the word "misleading," to strike out the comma; and in line 24, before the word "inaccurate," to insert "knowingly," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. Any person who shall violate the provisions of section 4 of this act, or who shall fail to evidence any contract mentioned in said section by a record in writing as therein required, or who shall knowingly or carelessly deliver for transmission through the mails or in interstate commerce by telegraph, telephone, wireless, or other means of communication false or misleading or knowingly inaccurate reports concerning crop or market information or conditions that affect or tend to affect the price of grain in interstate commerce, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both, together with the costs of prosecution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

DISTRIBUTION AND SALE OF FUEL—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 251).

Mr. CUMMINS. I submit the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12472) to declare a national emergency to exist in the production, transportation, and distribution of coal and other fuel, granting additional powers to the Interstate Commerce Commission, providing for the appointment of a Federal fuel distributor, providing for the declaration of car-service priorities in interstate commerce during the present and any succeeding emergency, and to prevent extortion in the sale of fuel; and ask that it may be printed, printed in the RECORD, and lie on the table.

Mr. ASHURST. Does the Senator from Iowa ask that the report of the committee of conference may be considered at this time?

Mr. CUMMINS. I simply wish to have the report printed, printed in the RECORD, and lie on the table.

The report was ordered to be printed, to be printed in the RECORD, and to lie on the table, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12472) to declare a national emergency to exist in the production, transportation, and distribution of coal and other fuel, granting additional powers to the Interstate Commerce Commission, providing for the appointment of a Federal fuel distributor, providing for the declaration of car-service priorities in interstate commerce during the present and any succeeding emergency, and to prevent extortion in the sale of fuel, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"That by reason of the prolonged interruption in the operation of a substantial part of the coal-mining industry in the United States and of the impairment in the service of certain carriers engaged in commerce between the States and by reason of the disturbance in economic and industrial conditions caused by the World War a national emergency exists which endangers the public health and general welfare of the people of the United States, injures industry and business generally throughout the United States, furnishes an opportunity for the disposition of coal and other fuel at unreasonably high prices, limits the supply of heat, light, and power, threatens to obstruct and hamper the operation of the Government of the United States and of its several departments, the transportation of the mails, the operation and efficiency of the Army and the Navy, and the operation of carriers engaged in commerce among the several States and with foreign countries.

"SEC. 2. That the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as amended, including the transportation act, 1920, and especially under section 402 of said transportation act, 1920, are, during the aforesaid emergency, enlarged to include the authority to issue in transportation of coal or other fuel orders for priorities in car service, embargoes, and other suitable measures in favor of or against any carrier, including vessels suitable for transportation of coal on the inland waters of the United States which for such purpose shall be subject to the interstate commerce act, or region, municipality, community, person, copartnership, or corporation, and to take any other necessary and appropriate steps for the priority in transportation and for the equitable distribution of coal or other fuel so as best to meet the emergency and to promote the general welfare, and to prevent upon the part of any person, partnership, association, or corporation the purchase or sale of coal or other fuel at prices unjustly or unreasonably high. This act shall not be construed as repealing any of the powers heretofore granted by law to the Interstate Commerce Commission, but shall be construed as conferring supplementary and additional powers to said commission and as an amendment to section 1 of the interstate commerce act, and subject to the limitations and definitions of commerce controlled by said act, and all powers given said Interstate Commerce Commission shall be applicable in the execution of this act.

"SEC. 3. Because of such emergency and to assure an adequate supply and an equitable distribution of coal and other fuel, and to facilitate the movement thereof between the several States and with foreign countries, to supply the Army and Navy, the Government of the United States and its several departments, and carriers engaged in interstate commerce with the same during such emergency, and for other purposes, and for the further purpose of assisting in carrying into effect the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission made under existing law or under section 2 hereof there is hereby created and established an agency of the United States to be known as Federal fuel distributor, whose appointment shall be made and compensation fixed by the President of the United States. Said distributor shall perform his duties under the direction of the President.

"SEC. 4. It shall be the duty of the Federal fuel distributor to ascertain:

"(a) Whether there exists within the United States or any part thereof a shortage of coal or other fuel and the extent of such shortage;

"(b) The fields of production of coal and other fuel and the principal markets to which such production is or may be transported and distributed and the means and methods of distribution;

"(c) The prices normally and usually charged for such coal and other fuel and whether current prices, considering the costs of production and distribution, are just and reasonable; and

"(d) The nature and location of the consumers, and what persons, copartnerships, corporations, regions, municipalities, or communities should under the acts to regulate commerce administered by the Interstate Commerce Commission, including the transportation act, 1920, in time of shortage of coal and other fuel, or the transportation thereof, receive priority in transportation and distribution, and the degree thereof, and any other facts relating to the production, transportation, and distribution of coal and other fuel; and when so ascertained the Federal fuel distributor shall make appropriate recommendations pertaining thereto to the Interstate Commerce Commission from time to time, either on his own motion or upon request of the commission, to the end that an equitable distribution of coal and other fuel may be secured, so as best to meet the emergency and promote the general welfare. All facts and data within the possession of the Federal fuel distributor shall be at all times accessible and furnished to the Interstate Commerce Commission upon its request. The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby authorized and directed to receive and consider the recommendation of the Federal fuel distributor, based upon his reports upon the foregoing subjects, and any other information which it may secure in any manner authorized by law.

"SEC. 5. The Federal fuel distributor may make such rules, regulations, and orders as he may deem necessary to carry out the duties imposed upon him by this act, and may cooperate with any department or agency of the Government, any State, Territory, district, or possession, or department, agency, or political subdivision thereof, or any person or persons, and may avail himself of the advice and assistance of any department, commission, or board of the Government, and may appoint or create any agent or agency to facilitate the power and authority herein conferred upon him; and he shall have the power to appoint, remove, and fix the compensation of such assistants and employees, not in conflict with existing laws, and make such expenditures for rent, printing, telegrams, telephones, furniture, stationery, office equipment, travel, and other operating expenses as shall be necessary for the due and effective administration of this act. All facts, data, and records relating to the production, supply, distribution, and transportation of coal and other fuel in the possession of any commission, board, agency, or department of the Government shall at all times be available to the Federal fuel distributor and the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the person having custody of such facts, data, and records shall furnish the same promptly to the Federal fuel distributor or his duly authorized agent or to the commission on request therefor.

"SEC. 6. That whenever the President shall be of the opinion that the national emergency hereby declared has passed he shall by proclamation declare the same, and thereupon, except as to prosecutions for offenses, this act shall no longer be in force or effect, and in no event shall it continue in force and effect for longer than 12 months from the passage thereof.

"SEC. 7. Every person or corporation who shall knowingly make any false representation to the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Federal fuel distributor or to any person acting in their behalf or the behalf of either of them respecting the price at which coal or other fuel has been, is being, or is to be, sold or bought, the inquiry being made for the purposes of this act, or whoever having obtained coal or other fuel through a priority order or direction shall dispose of the same for purposes other than those for which said priority order or direction was issued without the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000: Provided, That any person or any officer or director of any corporation subject to the provisions of this act, or the interstate commerce act and the acts amendatory thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by any such corporation, who shall be convicted as aforesaid, shall, in addition to the fine herein provided for, be liable to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term not exceeding two years, in the discretion of the court. Every violation of this section may be prosecuted in any court of the United States having jurisdiction of crimes within the district in which such violation is committed, or through which the transportation is conducted, or in which the car service is performed, or in which such concession or discrimination is granted or given or solicited or accepted or received; and whenever the offense is begun in one jurisdiction and completed in another it may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in either jurisdiction in the same manner as if the offense had been actually and wholly committed therein.

"SEC. 8. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $250,000, available until expended, for the purposes of this act, including payment of personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and all expenses incident to organizing the work of the President's fuel distribution committee, and not exceeding $50,000 thereof shall be available for reimbursement and payment upon specific approval of the President of expenses incurred since May 15, 1922, in connection with the work of the President's fuel distribution committee organized for the purpose of helping to meet the emergency existing in the matter of fuel."

And the Senate agree to the same.

The title has been amended to conform to the text as agreed upon in conference, as follows:

"To declare a national emergency to exist in the production, transportation, and distribution of coal and other fuel, granting additional powers to the Interstate Commerce Commission, providing for the appointment of a Federal fuel distributor, providing for the declaration of car-service priorities during the present emergency, and to prevent the sale of fuel at unjust and unreasonably high prices."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Mr. MOSES obtained the floor.

REGISTRATION OF TRADE-MARKS.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the Liberian loan being under discussion, I wish to offer a few observations on paragraph 526 of the tariff bill.

When this proposal was before the Senate I vainly attempted to have a point of order against it sustained, and in the course of the brief discussion which I was permitted to make upon it, owing to the strangulation of debate which then governed the Senate, I was able to do no more than to make a brief statement of my belief that the provision contravened our treaty obligations.

I have since addressed an inquiry to the Department of State on that topic, and I have received from the Acting Secretary of State a letter in reply which seems fully to sustain the contention I then made, and I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary may read that letter.

There being no objection, the letter was read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 9, 1922.

The Hon. GEORGE H. MOSES,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of August 26, 1922, requesting an expression of opinion on the question whether section 526 of the tariff bill recently passed by the Senate is in conflict with any treaties now in force to which the United States is a signatory.

It is noted that the section to which you refer contains a provision reading as follows:

"That it shall be unlawful to import into the United States any merchandise of foreign manufacture if such merchandise or the label, sign, print, package, wrapper, or receptacle bears a trade-mark registered in the Patent Office by a person domiciled in the United States under the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the registration of trade-marks * * * and to protect the same,' approved February 20, 1905, as amended."

It is understood that the purpose and effect of the provision quoted would be to secure protection of trade-marks to persons domiciled in the United States who have registered trade-marks in the United States Patent Office. As bearing on the section of the tariff bill under consideration, attention is called to article 2 of the Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property, signed at Washington June 2, 1911, to which the United States and most of the countries of Europe are parties. Article 2 of the convention reads as follows:

"The subjects or citizens of each of the contracting countries shall enjoy in all other countries of the union, with regard to patents of invention, models of utility, industrial designs or models, trade-marks, trade names, the statements of place of origin, suppression of unfair competition, the advantages which the respective laws now grant or may hereafter grant to the citizens of that country. Consequently they shall have the same protection as the latter and the same legal remedies against any infringements of their rights, provided they comply with the formalities and requirements imposed by the national laws of each State upon its own citizens. Any obligation of domicile or of establishment in the country where the protection is claimed shall not be imposed on the members of the union."

It will be observed that under the provisions of article 2 of the convention the nationals of countries whose Governments are parties to the convention are entitled in the United States to the same advantages which the laws of the United States grant to American citizens, and that article 2 in terms prohibits the establishment of an obligation of domicile on the part of persons entitled to the benefits of the convention.

It is the view of the department that for reasons indicated by the foregoing section 526 of the tariff bill, if enacted into law, would discriminate in favor of persons domiciled in the United States in contravention of article 2 of the Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property and would deprive persons who registered trade-marks in the United States Patent Office and who reside abroad of the protection to which they would be entitled under the terms of the convention.

A copy of the Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property is transmitted herewith.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

WILLIAM PHILLIPS,
Acting Secretary of State.

Mr. MOSES. I have here a copy of the convention to which the Acting Secretary of State refers, which shows that the convention is operative among 21 nations; in other words, as I predicted in the Senate when the section was under consideration, it will be necessary to carry on prolonged negotiations if the section remains. I ask unanimous consent that the convention may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave is granted.

The convention referred to is as follows:

(Treaty series No. 579.)

CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND OTHER POWERS FOR THE PROTECTION OF INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY—REVISING THE PARIS CONVENTION OF MARCH 20, 1883, AS MODIFIED BY THE ADDITIONAL ACT SIGNED AT BRUSSELS ON DECEMBER 14, 1900.

A PROCLAMATION BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Whereas a convention for the protection of industrial property, and revising the Paris convention of March 20, 1883, as modified by the additional act signed at Brussels on December 14, 1900, was concluded and signed by the plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and certain other powers, members of the International Union for the Protection of Industrial Property, at Washington on the 2d day of June, 1911, the original of which convention, being in the French language, is word for word, as follows:

And whereas the said convention has been duly ratified by the United States of America, Germany, Austria-Hungary, the Dominican Republic, Spain, the French Republic, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, the United Mexican States, Norway, the Netherlands, Portugal, Switzerland, and Tunis, and the ratifications were deposited with the Government of the United States on the 1st day of April, 1913;

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, have caused the said convention to be made public, to the end that the same and every article and clause thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 29th day of April, in the year of our Lord 1913, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and thirty-seventh.

[SEAL.] WOODROW WILSON.

By the President:
JOHN B. MOORE,
Acting Secretary of State.

The President of the French Republic for Tunis:

M. de Peretti de la Rocca, Premier Secrétaire de l'Ambassade de la République française à Washington;

Who, after having been given their full respective powers, made in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1.

The contracting countries constitute a state of union for the protection of industrial property.

ARTICLE 2.

The subjects or citizens of each of the contracting countries shall enjoy, in all the other countries of the union, with regard to patents of invention, models of utility, industrial designs or models, trade-marks, trade names, the statements of place of origin, suppression of unfair competition, the advantages which the respective laws now grant or may hereafter grant to the citizens of that country. Consequently, they shall have the same protection as the latter and the same legal remedies against any infringements of their rights, provided they comply with the formalities and requirements imposed by the national laws of each State upon its own citizens. Any obligation of domicile or of establishment in the country where the protection is claimed shall not be imposed on the members of the union.

ARTICLE 3.

The subjects or citizens of countries which do not form part of the union, who are domiciled or own effective and bona fide industrial or commercial establishments in the territory of any of the countries of the union, shall be assimilated to the subjects or citizens of the contracting countries.

ARTICLE 4.

(a) Any person who shall have duly filed an application for a patent, utility model, industrial design or model, or trade-mark, in one of the contracting countries, or the successor or assignee of such person, shall enjoy, for the purpose of filing application in the other countries and subject to the rights of third parties, a right of priority during the periods hereinafter specified.

(b) Consequently the subsequent filing in one of the other countries of the union, prior to the expiration of such periods, shall not be invalidated by acts performed in the interval, especially by another application, by publication of the invention or the working of the same, by the sale of copies of the design or model, nor by the use of the mark.

(c) The periods of priority above referred to shall be 12 months for patents and models of utility and 4 months for industrial designs and models, as also for trade-marks.

(d) Whoever shall wish to avail himself of the priority of an anterior filing shall be required to make a declaration showing the date and the country of this filing. Each country shall determine at what moment, at the latest, this declaration must be executed. This information shall be mentioned in the publications issued by the competent administration, particularly on patents and the specifications relative thereto. The contracting countries shall require of one who makes a declaration of priority the production of a copy of the application (specification, drawings, etc.) previously filed, certified to be a true copy by the administration which shall have received it. This copy shall be dispensed from any legalization. It may be required that it be accompanied by a certificate of the date of filing, issuing from this administration and of a translation. Other formalities shall not be required for the declaration of priority at the time of the filing of the application. Each contracting country shall determine the consequences of the omission of the formalities prescribed by the present article, unless these consequences exceed the loss of the right of priority.

(e) Later other justifications can be demanded.

ARTICLE 4½.

Patents applied for in the different contracting countries by persons admitted to the benefit of the convention in the terms of articles 2 and 3 shall be independent of the patents obtained for the same invention in the other countries, adherent or not to the union.

This provision shall be understood in an absolute manner, particularly in the sense that the patents applied for during the term of priority are independent, as much from the point of view of the causes of nullity and of forfeitures as from the point of view of the normal duration.

It applies to all patents existing at the time of entrance into force.

It shall be likewise, in case of accession of new countries, for patents existing on both sides at the time of accession.

ARTICLE 5.

The importation, by the patentee, into the country where the patent has been granted, of articles manufactured in any of the countries of the union shall not entail forfeiture.

However, the patentee shall be obliged to work his patent according to the laws of the country into which he introduces the patented objects, but with the restriction that the patent shall not be liable to forfeiture because of nonworking in one of the countries of the union until after a term of three years from the date of the filing of the application in that country, and only in case the patentee shall fail to show sufficient cause for his inaction.

ARTICLE 6.

Every trade-mark regularly registered in the country of origin shall be admitted to registration and protected as that in the other countries of the union.

However, there may be refused or invalidated—

1. Marks which are of a nature to infringe rights acquired by third parties in the country where protection is claimed.

2. Marks devoid of all distinctive character, or even composed exclusively of signs or data which may be used in commerce, to designate the kind, quality, quantity, destination, value, place of origin of the products or the time of production, or become common in the current language or the legal and steady customs of commerce of the country where the protection is claimed.

In the estimation of the distinctive character of a mark, all the circumstances existing should be taken into account, particularly the duration of the use of the mark.

3. Marks which are contrary to morals or public order.

The country where the applicant has his principal establishment shall be considered as the country of origin.

If this principal establishment is not located in one of the countries of the union, that to which the applicant belongs shall be considered as country of origin.

ARTICLE 7.

The nature of the product on which the trade-mark is to be applied can not in any case be an obstacle to the filing of the mark.

ARTICLE 7½.

The contracting countries agree to admit for filing and to protect marks belonging to associations the existence of which is not contrary to the law of the country of origin, even if these associations do not possess an industrial or commercial establishment.

Each country shall be judge of the special conditions under which an association may be admitted to have the marks protected.

ARTICLE 8.

Trade names shall be protected in all the countries of the Union without the obligation of filing, whether it be a part or not of a trade-mark.

ARTICLE 9.

Any product bearing illegally a trade-mark or a trade name shall be seized at importation in those of the countries of the union in which this mark or this trade name may have a right to legal protection.

If the laws of a country do not admit of seizure on importation, the seizure shall be replaced by prohibition of importation.

The seizure shall be likewise effected in the country where illegal affixing shall have been made, or in the country into which the product shall have been imported.

The seizure shall be made at the request of the public ministry, or any other competent authority, or by an interested party, individual, or society, in conformity to the interior laws of each country.

The authorities shall not be required to make the seizure in transit.

If the laws of a country admit neither of the seizure on importation nor the prohibition of importation, nor seizure in said country, these measures shall be replaced by the acts and means which the law of such country would assure in like case to its own citizens.

ARTICLE 10.

The provisions of the preceding article shall be applicable to any product bearing falsely, as indication of place of production, the name of a definite locality, when this indication shall be joined to a fictitious or borrowed trade name with an intention to defraud.

The interested party is considered any producer, manufacturer or merchant, engaged in the production, manufacture or commerce of such product, and established either in the locality falsely indicated as place of production or in the region where this locality is situated.

ARTICLE 10½.

All the contracting countries agree to assure to the members of the union an effective protection against unfair competition.

ARTICLE 11.

The contracting countries shall accord, in conformity with their national laws, a temporary protection to patentable inventions, working models, industrial models or designs, as well as to trade-marks, for products exhibited at international expositions, official or officially recognized, organized in the territory of one of them.

ARTICLE 12.

Each of the contracting countries agrees to establish a special service for industrial property and a central office for the communication to the public of patents, working models, industrial models, or designs and trade-marks.

This service shall publish, as often as possible, an official periodical.

ARTICLE 13.

The international office instituted at Berne under the name of "Bureau international pour la protection de la Propriété industrielle" is placed under the high authority of the Government of the Swiss Confederation, which regulates its organization and supervises its operation.

The international bureau shall centralize information of any nature relative to the protection of industrial property, and form it in a general statistical report which shall be distributed to all administrations. It shall proceed to considerations of common utility interesting to the union and shall edit, with the aid of the documents put at its disposal by the different administrations, a periodical in the French language on questions concerning the object of the union.

Numbers of this periodical, like all the documents published by the international bureau, shall be distributed among the administrations of the countries of the union, in proportion to the number of contributive units mentioned below. Copies and supplementary documents which shall be requested, either by the said administrations, or by societies or individuals, shall be paid for separately.

The international bureau shall hold itself at all times at the disposition of the members of the union, to furnish them special information of which they may have need, on the questions relative to the international service of industrial property. It shall make an annual report of its management which shall be communicated to all members of the union.

The official language of the international bureau shall be French.

The expense of the international bureau shall be borne in common by the contracting countries. They may not, in any case, exceed the sum of 60,000 francs per year.

In order to determine the contributive part of each of the countries in this sum total of the expenses, the contracting countries and those which later join the union shall be divided into six classes, each contributing in proportion to a certain number of units, to wit:

	Units.
Class 1	25
Class 2	20
Class 3	15
Class 4	10
Class 5	5
Class 6	3

These coefficients shall be multiplied by the number of countries of each class, and the sum of the products thus obtained will furnish the number of units by which the total expenses are to be divided. The quotient will give the amount of the unit of expense.

Each of the contracting countries shall designate at the time of its accession the class in which it wishes to be ranked.

The Government of the Swiss Confederation shall supervise the expenses of the international bureau, make necessary advances and draw up annual statements of accounts which shall be communicated to all the other administrations.

ARTICLE 14.

The present convention shall be submitted to periodical revisions, with a view to introducing improvements in it of a nature to perfect the system of the union.

To this end conferences of the delegates of the contracting countries shall be held successively in one of the said countries.

The administration of the country where the conference is to be held shall prepare, with the concurrence of the international bureau, the works of such conference.

The director of the international bureau will assist at the meetings of the conferences and take part in the discussions without a vote.

ARTICLE 15.

It is understood that the contracting countries reserve to themselves, respectively, the right to make separately, between themselves special arrangements for the protection of industrial property, in so far as these arrangements may not interfere with the provisions of the present convention.

ARTICLE 16.

The countries which have not taken part in the present convention shall be permitted to adhere to it upon their request.

Notice of adhesion shall be made through diplomatic channels to the Government of the Swiss Confederation, and by the latter to all the others.

It shall entail complete adhesion to all the clauses and admission to all the advantages stipulated by the present convention, and shall take effect one month after the notification made by the Government of the Swiss Confederation to the other unionist countries, unless a later date shall have been indicated by the adhering country.

ARTICLE 16½.

The contracting countries have the right to adhere at any time to the present convention for their colonies, possessions, dependencies, and protectorates, or for certain ones of them.

They may, to this end, either make a general declaration by which all their colonies, possessions, dependencies, and protectorates are included in the adherence, or expressly name those included therein, or simply indicate those excluded from it.

This declaration shall be made in writing to the Government of the Swiss Confederation and by the latter made to all the others.

The contracting countries can, under like conditions, renounce the convention for their colonies, possessions, dependencies, and protectorates, or for certain ones of them.

ARTICLE 17.

The fulfillment of the reciprocal obligations contained in the present convention is subordinated, in so far as need be, to compliance with the formalities and regulations established by the constitutional laws of those of the contracting countries which are bound to secure the application of the same which they engage to do with the least possible delay.

ARTICLE 17½.

The convention shall remain in force an indefinite time, until the expiration of one year from the day when the renunciation shall be made.

This renunciation shall be addressed to the Government of the Swiss Confederation. It shall effect only the country giving such notice, the convention remaining operative as to the other contracting countries.

ARTICLE 18.

The present act shall be ratified, and the ratifications filed in Washington, at the latest, April 1, 1913. It shall be put into execution, among the countries which shall have ratified it, one month after the expiration of this period of time.

This act, with its final protocol, shall replace, in the relations of the countries which shall have ratified it, the convention of Paris, March 20, 1883; the final protocol annexed to that act; the protocol of Madrid, April 15, 1891, relating to the dotation of the international bureau, and the additional act of Brussels, December 14, 1900. However, the acts cited shall remain binding on the countries which shall not have ratified the present act.

ARTICLE 19.

The present act shall be signed in a single copy, which shall be filed in the archives of the Government of the United States. A certified copy shall be sent by the latter to each of the unionist Governments.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present act.

Final Protocol.

At the time of proceeding to the signing of the act concluded on this day, the undersigned plenipotentiaries are agreed upon the following:

AD ARTICLE 1.

The words "Propriete industrielle" (industrial property) shall be taken in their broadest acceptation; they extend to all production in the domain of agricultural industries (wines, grains, fruits, animals, etc.) and extractives (minerals, mineral waters, etc.).

AD ARTICLE 2.

(a) Under the name of patents are comprised the different kinds of industrial patents admitted by the laws of the contracting countries, such as patents of importation, patents of improvement, etc., for the processes as well as for the products.

(b) It is understood that the provision in Article 2 which dispenses the members of the Union from the obligation of domicile and of establishment has an interpretable character and must, consequently, be applied to all the rights granted by the convention of March 20, 1883, before the entrance into force of the present act.

(c) It is understood that the provisions of Article 2 do not infringe the laws of each of the contracting countries in regard to the procedure followed before the courts and the competency of those courts, as well as the election of domicile or the declaration of the selection of an attorney required by the laws on patents, working models, marks, etc.

AD ARTICLE 4.

It is understood that when an industrial model or design shall have been filed in a country by virtue of the right of priority based on the filing of a working model, the term of priority shall be only that which Article 4 has fixed for industrial models and designs.

AD ARTICLE 6.

It is understood that the provision of the first paragraph of Article 6 does not exclude the right to require of the depositor a certificate of regular registration in the country of origin, issued by competent authority.

It is understood that the use of badges, insignia, or public decorations which shall not have been authorized by competent powers, or the use of official signs and stamps of control and of guaranty adopted by a unionist country, may be considered as contrary to public order in the sense of No. 3 of Article 6.

However, marks which contain, with the authorization of competent powers, the reproduction of badges, decorations, or public insignia, shall not be considered as contrary to public order.

It is understood that a mark shall not be considered as contrary to public order for the sole reason that it is not in conformity with some provision of laws on marks, except in the case where such provision itself concerns public order.

The present final protocol, which shall be ratified at the same time as the act concluded on this day, shall be considered as forming an integral part of this act, and shall be of like force, value, and duration.

In witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present protocol.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I have no intention of taking further time of the Senate in a discussion of the question, inasmuch as it seems to be taken for granted that if the conferees are to back into a conference, if I may quote the words of the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], which is full and free, I am merely offering the letter of the Acting Secretary of State and the convention to which it refers, and making some reminiscent references to what I said in the Senate when the subject was under consideration, in the hope that the Senate conferees may take some judicial notice of the conditions as they exist and may bring in a tariff bill which will not tend to make our treaty obligations scraps of paper.

INDIAN SCHOOL, RAPID CITY, S. DAK.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber this morning when the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted a report on the bill (S. 3936) to rebuild the boys' dormitory at the Indian school, Rapid City, S. Dak. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. I think it will take but a moment and it will provoke no discussion.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, in line 7, to strike out "$60,000" and insert "$50,000," and, in line 9, to strike out "$60,000" and insert "$50,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to rebuild the boys' dormitory at the Indian school, Rapid City, S. Dak., recently destroyed by fire, and to refurnish said building, at a cost not to exceed $50,000; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000 for rebuilding and equipping said dormitory, which sum shall be immediately available.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MASONIC MUTUAL RELIEF ASSOCIATION.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 11116) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. FRANCE. I object. I wish to see the unfinished business disposed of, and then these other matters may come up. I shall object to the consideration of any other measure until the unfinished business is disposed of.

LIBERIAN LOAN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 270) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to establish a credit with the United States Government for the Government of Liberia.

Mr. ASHURST. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 2 it is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause down to line 17, inclusive, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, on behalf of the United States, to establish a credit with the United States for the Government of Liberia, subject to the approval of the President and in conformity with an appropriate arrangement made under his direction for that purpose, in an amount not to exceed the sum of $5,000,000, and to the extent of the credit so established, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to purchase from that Government its obligations hereafter issued, bearing such rate or rates of interest, maturing at such date or dates, and containing such terms and conditions as the Secretary may from time to time determine; and a sufficient sum of money is hereby appropriated, out of money not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the purposes of this resolution.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the effect of the amendment, if adopted, will be to strike out that part of the joint resolution which proposes to advance to the Liberian Government the sum of $5,000,000, and, of course, it will leave as the body and substance of the measure the amendment which has just been adopted by the Senate. Upon my amendment I shall at the proper time ask for the yeas and nays.

So Mr. ASHURST's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi will be stated.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to add, at the end of the joint resolution, the following:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000 to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to appoint such additional number of inspectors of locomotive boilers under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their locomotives with safe and suitable boilers and appurtenances thereto," approved February 17, 1911, as may be necessary to meet the present emergency.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Upon yesterday I received a telegram which I should have then inserted in the RECORD, but, a quorum being lacking, I did not have an opportunity to do so. It is a telegram from J. P. Morgan & Co., Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and the National City Bank of New York. I ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

[Telegram.]

NEW YORK, September 12, 1922.

Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

A statement has appeared in the newspapers in connection with the Senate debate on the proposed Liberian loan quoting you as follows: "Now, let me take another feature of this loan business. I do not think it very difficult to find out why the loan is being urged. I read on pages 124 and 125 of the Ways and Means Committee hearings that Kuhn, Loeb & Co., J. P. Morgan & Co., and the National City Bank have claims of over $1,000,000 against Liberia and that this loan is to pay these claims among other things," and further, "that these claims which are to be taken care of in this way were claims which had been bought up for 10 to 20 cents on the dollar and that they are now being turned in and taken care of by the Government of the United States and the taxpayers of the United States on the basis of dollar for dollar." These statements in so far as they apply to any of the undersigned are based on a misapprehension of the facts. We have no knowledge of the inception of the proposed new loan, have never urged it, nor have we interest in it. Our sole connection with Liberian finances was that in 1912, at the suggestion of the State Department, we, together with other bankers, negotiated a loan of $1,700,000 for Liberia, the bonds of which were practically all placed abroad by bankers in Europe. The transaction was taken up solely in an effort to be helpful in a situation in which the State Department took an interest. The combined present holdings of the undersigned in the old loan amounts to less than $5,000 bonds for which we paid 90 per cent of par and which we have held since the original issue, namely, for nearly 10 years. We have no other interest in or claim against Liberia.

(Signed) J. P. MORGAN & CO.
KUHN, LOEB & CO.
NATIONAL CITY BANK.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in order that the record may be complete, I ask that my answer to that telegram may now be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 13.

J. P. MORGAN & CO.,
Bankers, New York City, N. Y.

GENTLEMEN: I have your telegram signed by yourself, Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and the National City Bank under date of September 12.

If you will have the kindness to examine the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 11, 1922, page 13411, you will find that my statement, in so far as it has any bearing upon yourself and other signers of the telegram, was literally and meticulously correct. I did not state that your claim had been purchased for 10 or 20 cents on the dollar. This was stated in reference to the floating indebtedness and before I had reached the portion of the agreement relating to your claim. My sole reference, practically, to your claim, consisted in reading paragraphs 4 and 5 from the agreement entered into October 28, 1921, between the Secretary of State and the Liberian Commission.

I do not intend at any time, if I know it, to make any statement not based on fact, and I am greatly pleased to find upon reexamination, and in the light of your telegram, that in this instance I have not been mistaken in the facts which I stated. If, after looking over the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, you conclude that there are any corrections to be made, I shall be glad to make them.

Very respectfully, WILLIAM E. BORAH.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, upon examination of the RECORD at page 13411 this is all made to appear very clearly. The statement which I made with reference to the purchase of this floating indebtedness was made in connection with paragraph 3 of the agreement which I read, the agreement made between the Secretary of State and the Liberian Commission, which paragraph 3 relates to a loan of $233,000, "or such less amount as shall be sufficient to enable the Government of Liberia to pay its internal funded debt and the interest due thereon." In connection with that, I said:

I have been informed by a party who has investigated the matter and who is, I think, wholly reliable—I know he is reliable so far as his information goes—that the claims which were taken care of in this way were claims which had been bought up for 10 to 20 cents on the dollar, and that they are now being turned in and taken care of by the Government of the United States and the taxpayers of the United States on the basis of dollar for dollar.

That related to a matter with which Kuhn, Loeb & Co., J. P. Morgan & Co., and the National City Bank, as I understand, had nothing to do and have nothing to do. The only reference I made to J. P. Morgan & Co., Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and the National City Bank was to read from the agreement itself paragraphs 4 and 5 of the agreement made by the Secretary of State and the Liberian Commission. I take it, of course, that the agreement was based upon facts. I made no comment as to what Kuhn, Loeb & Co. paid for their bonds. I did not know. I since have found out, but I did not know at the time and made no comment about that. They inform me themselves in their telegram what they paid for them, and that is the first I knew about it; but I want to reread this into the RECORD in order that the matter may be here:

5. One million six hundred and fifty thousand dollars, or such less amount as may be necessary for the purpose of enabling the Government of Liberia to purchase or redeem all of its bonds now issued and outstanding representing the 5 per cent sinking-fund gold loan, due July 1, 1952, under the agreement for refunding loan dated March 7, 1912, between the Republic of Liberia, of the first part, and J. P. Morgan & Co.; Kuhn, Loeb & Co.; the National City Bank of New York; and First National Bank of New York, acting for themselves and for Robert Fleming & Co., Banque de Paris et des Pays Bas; M. M. Warburg & Co.; and Hope & Co., and for others, of the second part, including such payments of interest, costs of notices and other payments or deposits, as well as payments which may be due from the Government of Liberia under the fiscal agency agreement dated March 7, 1912, between the Republic of Liberia, of the first part, and the National City Bank of New York, of the second part, as shall be necessary to terminate all obligations of the Government of Liberia under all of said bonds or under the agreements for refunding loan or the fiscal agency agreement above mentioned, as shall entitle the Government of Liberia in accordance with the terms of said agreement to the cancellation and destruction of all said bonds held by the fiscal agents in the sinking fund mentioned in said agreements. Advances for this purpose shall be made at such times and in such amounts as shall be determined by the Secretary of State of the United States. It is understood that the Secretary of State of the United States may determine the best method for acquiring part or all of the aforesaid bonds, but in no event shall more than par and accrued interest be paid therefor.

That is the quotation from the agreement itself. Then I proceed to say:

So it appears, Mr. President, that this money is to be utilized in large measure in the first instance to take care of certain internal debts and certain other floating debt, which I have stated has been purchased, as I am informed, and is held by speculators, and by taking up a bonded indebtedness of $1,650,000 which is due to certain bankers in New York City.

So, Mr. President, I think that upon examination of the RECORD the signers of the telegram will find that the thing which evidently misled them was in not knowing to what particular kind of indebtedness I referred when I spoke of the question of purchasing for 10 or 20 cents on the dollar. In every respect the statement I made, even according to their telegram, is accurate.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Mississippi, I should like to place in the RECORD the statement of Mr. Kelley, an officer in the Treasury Department, in relation to this loan, which I think is germane to the matter just discussed by the Senator from Idaho. I ask unanimous consent that it be read into the RECORD by the Secretary at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHIELDS. This statement was the evidence of Mr. Kelley before the Committee on the Judiciary some two years ago, when a bill introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] was being considered, which prohibited further foreign loans. There are several pages of it, and I have marked where it begins and where it ends.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

Senator SHIELDS. I want to ask Mr. Kelley where we would find this information. I notice in the Washington Times a statement of what is contained in the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury to the bill filed by Mr. Hearst in one of the courts of the District of Columbia to enjoin him from making further loans. As I said, I have not seen the answer, and I only know what is given in the Times, purporting to be a copy of it. This is the clause I refer to, this paragraph of the answer to the petition in the Times:

"Advances to Liberia will be made only for specific purposes for which commitments have heretofore been incurred."

The only commitment that has been placed in evidence is one allowing money for the expenses of the delegates of Liberia to the Peace Conference, which I understand have been paid. Now, what other commitments are referred to here?

Mr. KELLEY. The Treasury did not deal directly with the representatives of Liberia, but dealt through the Department of State.

The expenses for which the Department of State incurred commitments on behalf of this Government will appear, so far as the Treasury is advised about them, in the correspondence which is contained in these containers here.

Senator SHIELDS. Have you read that correspondence?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes.

Senator SHIELDS. What are those commitments?

Mr. KELLEY. I may say that as between the Treasury Department and the Department of State, we never became entirely clear what the extent of the commitments was. It was a matter of discussion between the two departments. The attitude of the Treasury has always been, as in every other case, to keep its commitments and the amount of money it would have to pay out at the lowest possible point.

Senator SHIELDS. Do you know the nature of them; the objects and purposes for which the money was to be used?

Mr. KELLEY. I can not speak offhand without looking at the papers. They are mainly to help the Liberian Government out financially, on its financial obligations, I think. They were in very bad shape in 1918.

Senator SHIELDS. Yes; I understood they wanted the money for financial purposes; but what particular purposes was the money to be used for?

Mr. KELLEY. I think it was mostly to take up their obligations of one kind and another.

Senator SHIELDS. Was it to take up obligations of two millions and some hundred thousands of dollars to J. P. Morgan & Co. and other New York banks?

Mr. KELLEY. I do not think their obligations, to which I assume you refer, were as big as that. I think they were a little over $1,000,000, if I recollect.

The CHAIRMAN. $1,700,000 or $1,800,000.

Mr. KELLEY. I have been so busy that I have not had time to look that up.

Senator SHIELDS. I understand that the fact that was submitted in regard to the Liberian loan was what was submitted in a statement, I think, of a representative of the Liberian Government, perhaps in the application for this loan, that they borrowed from these three banks in New York about two million and some hundred thousand dollars in 1912, which they are unable now to pay, and on which they were unable even to meet the interest, I believe.

Is there a commitment to pay that money to those banks out of this $5,000,000 credit?

Mr. KELLEY. The obligations to which the Senator refers are bonds issued under an indenture somewhat as in the case of railroad bonds, or something of that sort, and I do not understand that the bonds are held to any appreciable extent by the parties whom the Senator has just mentioned. My understanding is that substantially all of them are held abroad.

Whether in the present state of the negotiations between this Government and Liberia there is a commitment to cover that I am unable to say. I may say, however, that the Treasury was willing to incur a commitment for that purpose, for reasons which will become clear to the committee when it examines the correspondence.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Do I understand you to say that you allowed the State Department to make these contracts?

Mr. KELLEY. In the case of Liberia there was no financial representative over here, and we dealt with that Government through the Department of State. With the other Governments we dealt directly. Liberia was an exceptional case.

Senator BRANDEGEE. But I understood you to say previously that you did not know the amount of the commitments, because the State Department made the commitments in the case of Liberia.

Mr. KELLEY. They are in negotiation with Liberia. I understand that a commission from Liberia is on its way here, or has just arrived or is just about to arrive.

Senator BRANDEGEE. There were some commitments made to Liberia, were there not?

Mr. KELLEY. Well, Senator, I am unable to say, because I do not know the state of those negotiations. I do not know whether the State Department is now in a position to say, for instance, that negotiations are all off or not.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Do you know whether or not the Treasury Department has made any commitments to Liberia or not?

Mr. KELLEY. The Treasury Department has not dealt directly with Liberia.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Therefore I assume you can, answering the question directly, say you have not made any commitment?

Mr. KELLEY. We have not made any direct commitments to Liberia.

Senator BRANDEGEE. And you do not know whether the State Department has or not?

Mr. KELLEY. No.

Senator BRANDEGEE. All right. Do you mean, Mr. Kelley, that the State Department, after consultation with the Treasury Department, with the consent of the Treasury Department, undertook to handle the dealings between this country and Liberia, and that, therefore, in a sense you constituted the State Department the agent of the Treasury Department? Is that what you mean to express? Or do you mean to say that the Treasury Department, as is entirely in order, has made any commitment by itself or in itself through the State Department?

Mr. KELLEY. No; the former is the situation. I do not commit myself as to whether the State Department is the agent of the Treasury or not. Leaving that matter aside, the point was that the Treasury Deparment wrote to the State Department certain letters, and the State Department took certain action, and the Treasury Department and the Department of State have been in discussion ever since as to the effect of what was done as between the two departments.

Now, as to the situation between the State Department and Liberia I am unable to say.

Senator STERLING. There is no question but what commitments were made to Liberia, is there?

The CHAIRMAN. As I understand it, not directly by your department?

Mr. KELLEY. No; we never dealt directly with Liberia. There is no question but what the Treasury wrote to the State Department stating certain commitments which it was willing to enter into.

Senator STERLING. Here, in the Secretary's report, these commitments are under the head of credits as established. That means commitments, does it not? The establishment of a credit is a commitment?

Mr. KELLEY. It depends on the terms of the credit, Senator. A great many of these credits were established for express purposes, or for purposes which should thereafter be agreed on; and beyond the extent of such purposes they are not commitments of the United States.

Senator STERLING. The expression used in the report is "credits established," and the amount stated for Liberia is $5,000,000, on which cash has been advanced to the amount of $26,000, leaving a balance of $4,974,000 for Liberia, according to this statement.

Mr. KELLEY. Senator, the purposes for which the Treasury intended that credit to be established were never, in the belief of the Treasury, such as would require the whole amount.

Senator NORRIS. In paying the money, was that paid to the State Department or to the Government of Liberia, or to the creditors, such as J. P. Morgan & Co., if you paid any money to them?

Mr. KELLEY. No, no; it was paid to the general receiver of Liberia.

Senator NORRIS. Who is he?

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. H. F. Worley.

Senator NORRIS. Who appointed him receiver?

Mr. KELLEY. Under the loan agreement I believe he was appointed by the President of Liberia, on the nomination of the President of the United States.

Senator NORRIS. Yes.

Senator REED. So far as you know, there was only $26,000 paid to him—actually paid?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes; that is all that was paid to him.

Senator NORRIS. Is all the balance of that money now in the Treasury? Has not anything been paid out on account of Liberia except $26,000?

Mr. KELLEY. That is absolutely all.

Senator NORRIS. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes.

Senator REED. I think you have it, Senator; but you have not been here all the time. There is a distinction between the commitment——

Senator NORRIS. And what is paid.

Senator REED. There is a distinction between the establishment of a credit and the commitment and what is paid.

Senator NORRIS. I understand that.

Senator REED. They established a credit of $5,000,000 and paid out $26,000; and the question now is whether they have put themselves in the position of committing this Government to something else.

Senator NORRIS. Exactly; I understand that.

Senator SHIELDS. In other words, what I was trying to get was what the Secretary of the Treasury meant in his sworn answer to the Hearst bill—I presume it was sworn, as it was intended to resist the allowance of an injunction—by the statement, "Advances to Liberia will be made only for specific purposes, for which commitments have heretofore been incurred." We have the credit established and then commitments under that established credit. What I wanted to know was, to whom were those commitments made?

Senator NORRIS. All right.

Senator SHIELDS. Or for what purpose they were made.

Senator NORRIS. First, as to the commitments. I understand a commitment to mean that we are at least morally bound to pay the amount for which the commitment has been made.

Senator SHIELDS. Yes; I understand commitments which are morally binding on the United States are made to the parties, really, to whom the money is to be paid. Suppose that a third party comes in, that is the party to receive the money. Then there is a complication of the case as to the moral obligation which accrues. I understand that probably we would be bound to pay the money where commitments had been made, because the United States had represented to certain parties that were going to get the money that the United States would pay it, and perhaps they had made advancements for munitions.

Senator NORRIS. When a commitment has been made, in reality it is a promise by the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the money for which the commitment has been made, is it not?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes.

Senator NORRIS. Acting on behalf of the Government of the United States.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, Senator.

Senator NORRIS. I understand that is what you mean by a commitment.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Mr. Kelley has already testified that the State Department and the Treasury Department have not agreed on an understanding of what the situation is, and it will be revealed by an inspection of the documents what the correspondence between the two departments has been, will it not?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes.

Senator NORRIS. Do you mean by that that there have been no commitments made?

Senator BRANDEGEE. It depends on the construction they place on these, as I understand it.

Mr. KELLEY. It depends also on the construction to be placed on dealings between the State Department and the Liberian Government.

Senator NORRIS. The Secretary of the Treasury regards that the Government now, under existing conditions, is under no moral obligation to make good on any of these commitments?

Mr. KELLEY. The Secretary of the Treasury emphatically does not believe that the Government is under no obligation.

Senator NORRIS. Is under any obligation?

Mr. KELLEY. No; is under no obligation.

Senator NORRIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. KELLEY. That is, the Secretary of the Treasury believes that the Government is under very definite commitments, obligations, to make certain advances.

Senator NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. KELLEY. As to the amount of some of those advances he is unable to say, because they are for purposes the entire extent of which can not be told now. For instance, one of them is the expense of repatriating certain Czecho-Slovak troops from Siberia.

Senator NORRIS. What I wanted to get was——

Mr. KELLEY (continuing). As to Liberia, the position is a little different. We are not certain, there, whether a commitment has been incurred or for just what purpose, and do not know exactly what the purpose will cost; but our position is that a commitment may have been incurred for us through the State Department. We are not entirely clear whether it has or not. If it has, we believe that we are bound to pay it.

Senator NORRIS. Outside, now, of the State Department, for the purposes of this question, eliminating the State Department, does the Secretary of the Treasury believe that we are under obligations—moral obligations—to pay to Liberia any sum, even though it may be indefinite, that has not been paid?

Mr. KELLEY. He believes that he may be under some obligation to Liberia.

Senator NORRIS. That depends on his negotiation with the State Department?

Mr. KELLEY. It depends on the negotiation of the State Department with the Liberian Government and the extent to which the State Department and the Liberian Government are able to convince the Secretary of the Treasury that their dealings amounted to a commitment.

Senator OVERMAN. The whole matter is involved in doubt, then.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes; those——

Senator NORRIS. You said awhile ago that the Secretary of the Treasury did not believe that there had been definite commitments made, and you referred to Liberia and other countries.

Mr. KELLEY. As to Liberia, he believes there may have been commitments, but is not able to say.

Senator NORRIS. You are not able to say, then, as to the State Department, whether in the judgment of the Treasury Department there have been any moral obligations incurred in regard to Liberia or not?

Mr. KELLEY. No; the Treasury Department would not be able to answer that question at this time.

Senator STERLING. The report shows that Liberia has had established in her favor a credit of $5,000,000. Then further on in the report the Secretary says this:

"Advances to Liberia will be made only for specific purposes, for which commitments have heretofore been incurred."

Do you know of commitments that have been incurred?

Mr. KELLEY. No.

Senator STERLING. Specific commitments?

Mr. KELLEY. The Treasury would be unable to define any commitments to Liberia at this time. What that was intended to mean was such commitments for its specific purposes as it may appear have been incurred.

(At this point the chairman left the room and Senator BRANDEGEE assumed the chair.)

Senator BRANDEGEE. As to the language of the Secretary to which Senator SHIELDS has alluded. I think that the Secretary may have meant by the use of that language that he is bound to pay commitments—any commitments—which have heretofore been made, if they have been made.

Mr. KELLEY. That is the point. That is it, exactly.

Senator BRANDEGEE. He does not know whether there have been any incurred or not.

Mr. KELLEY. That is not a statement that there are commitments.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I have listened with interest to the reading from the report of the hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary relative to the commitments to foreign governments in the way of credits. There was a credit established for Liberia of $5,000,000, on which $26,000 was advanced; but, as I understand it, the credit was for specific purposes, and after the advancement of $26,000 the credit was withdrawn.

I do not base my support of this joint resolution on the establishment of any credit with Liberia. I base it on other grounds altogether. I do not believe that any legal or any moral obligation arises out of the credit we once said we would extend to the Republic of Liberia. I think, just as in the case of Russia, where we established a credit of $325,000,000, that credit could be withdrawn, as it was withdrawn in that case after something more than $187,000,000 had been advanced on the credit. I base my support of the joint resolution on other considerations, and those considerations are found largely in the recitals of the preamble to the resolution; they grow out of our relation for almost a century with Liberia. The fact that Liberia was for a long time under American auspices before she became an independent Republic, and that in the formation of a Republic she had the encouragement of this Nation and our people generally, are considerations which are to be thought of at the present time. Let me call attention to the recitals of the preamble, as follows:

Whereas the Republic of Liberia, having been established through the efforts of American citizens and having been established under the fostering care of this Government, has at various times sought the aid and counsel of this Government, and following the declaration of war made by this Government against Germany made common cause with the Government and the other allied or associated Governments in its declaration of war against Germany on August 4, 1917.

In consequence of the war the economic situation of Liberia has been imperiled and its Government has made urgent representations to the United States for financial aid and has sent its plenipotentiaries to Washington for the purpose of concluding a loan;

This Government being actuated by feelings of traditional friendship for the Republic of Liberia and solicitous for its well-being and continued independence and for the peaceful development and future advancement of the Negro race: Therefore be it resolved, etc.

There is not one word in this preamble in regard to a commitment made to Liberia during the war or after the war had ended to extend a credit to Liberia of $5,000,000, or any other sum whatsoever. The resolution itself, as appears by this preamble, is based on other considerations.

I call attention, in addition to the historical recitals contained in this preamble, to another authority. This is from Secretary Knox when he was Secretary of State. He said:

The story of Liberia, from its earliest inception to its elevation to independent statehood, demonstrates its American character throughout. Its first foothold on the African coast was through the efforts of American citizens. From 1819 the association of the Government of the United States with the project is distinct. The colony was a necessary factor in the execution of a Federal statute.

That, I think, was the statute forbidding the importation of slaves into this country.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. May I ask from what the Senator is reading?

Mr. STERLING. I am reading from a report by Mr. Knox, when he was Secretary of State, made in 1910 to the President.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me further, my investigation leads me to say that this country had nothing in the world to do with the establishment of that Republic. It was England which insisted that Liberia become a republic, and England, France, and other countries acknowledged the independence of Liberia before the United States did.

Mr. STERLING. I want to say, in reply to the Senator from Georgia, that it was through the impulse given the movement by gentlemen from the South, prominent citizens in the South, that attempts were first made to colonize Liberia. The obvious purpose on the part of those gentlemen was to afford a refuge for emancipated slaves, they themselves being in part hostile to the institution of slavery. That was particularly true of citizens in the States of Maryland and Virginia.

Later the American Colonization Society, not being able to protect its interests and its territory in Liberia, for its own welfare and for the good of the cause for which it stood, promoted the idea of an independent nation. They concluded that in that way only could they secure their rights, prevent aggression on the part of Great Britain and France, and control the native population. Let me say to the Senator that it was to the reproach of the United States that she did not as quickly as Great Britain and France acknowledge the independence of Liberia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If the Senator, in the midst of his criticism, will allow me further, I would say that the American Colonization Society acted in cooperation with a British society. It is true that such statesmen as Mr. Clay ceased to cooperate in the enterprise, but the Republic of Liberia was established at the instance of Great Britain, and the only disputes which Liberia has had with Great Britain and France about territorial limits have been settled by arbitration.

Mr. STERLING. Very well. Great Britain, of course, may have used her influence, but did not compel nor secure the formation of an independent government for Liberia. Let me continue the reading.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, will the Senator state the occasion for the report from which he has read?

Mr. STERLING. It was a report to the President of the United States by Mr. Knox as Secretary of State. It is found in Senate Document 457.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understood that, but what was the occasion?

Mr. STERLING. I do not know what the occasion was. I find the report or the excerpt from it as a footnote to the pamphlet which I hold in my hand, entitled "The United States and Liberia," by Roland P. Falkner, published in July, 1910.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does the Senator know the object of the pamphlet?

Mr. STERLING. The pamphlet is from the Journal of International Law and deals with Liberia. I think it deals wholly with the subject of Liberia.

I continue the reading:

The colony was a necessary factor in the execution of a Federal statute. The vessels of the United States participated in the initial act of colonization. Negotiations with the inland tribes for the purchase of lands were conducted by officers of the United States. Prior to the Civil War the United States maintained a squadron on the west coast of Africa to suppress the slave trade, and the officers of this squadron lent their aid and assistance to the Liberians in their troubles with the natives. In 1886 Congress authorized the Secretary of the Navy to transfer a gunboat to Liberia, but no vessel was found available for the intended service.

That was about 40 years after they had established their independence.

Thus the resources of the United States Government have been employed to colonize the liberated Africans, to build homes for them, to furnish them with farming utensils, to pay instructors for them, to purchase or charter ships for their convenience, to detail naval vessels for the transport of its agents and as convoys to the colonists, to build forts for the protection of the settlers, to supply them with arms and munitions of war, to enlist troops to guard them, and to employ the Army and Navy in their defense.

If the United States was not the first, I would say to the Senator from Georgia, to acknowledge the independence of Liberia, it is very evident that she had some part afterwards in controlling the affairs of Liberia and in protecting the Liberians.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, as he refers to me, if he will take the pains to examine the history of Liberia he will see that the statements in the report from which he is reading are not sustained by standard histories approved by Liberia itself.

Mr. STERLING. I do not know what is the Senator's authority, but I undertake to say that the statements contained in this excerpt from the report of Secretary Knox are true and that the facts of history will verify them.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I had the books here yesterday, but sent them back to the library. In a few moments I could get them again. They absolutely controvert what the Senator is saying with so much eloquence and earnestness.

Mr. STERLING. It will be a dispute then not between myself and the Senator from Georgia, but a dispute between his authorities and mine. I read further:

The initial organization of the Commonwealth was perfected and controlled by the parent societies in the United States, and the eventual creation of the Republic of Liberia was due to the generous counsel and action of the American societies in advising the organization to become an independent state and in relinquishing to the new state the directory powers they had theretofore exercised.

I cite that as an authority to be taken in connection with the statement of the Senator from Georgia to the effect that it was upon the insistence of Great Britain that Liberia became an independent nation.

Now, Mr. President, there are the considerations, the moral considerations, if you please, upon which I base my support of the joint resolution. Let me read a little further from an article entitled "Liberia and negro rule," found in the last number of the Atlantic Monthly, an article written by Mr. Evans Lewin. He has discussed the rule of Great Britain in Sierra Leone, the rule of France in western Africa, and then he comes to speak as follows:

It may not be considered out of place therefore if I attempt to apply the lessons already learned during a long period of experimental administration in West Africa to the question of Liberia. There the problem is essentially different from what it is in any other portion of the continent, because Liberia is a large and practically undeveloped country in which, in the past, a small educated native community, settled along the coast, largely the descendants of freed slaves and not necessarily of the same races as the remainder of the natives, has been struggling to educate and administer upon European lines the large and unresponsive masses of the interior.

It is a singular fact that African natives, as a whole, feel little respect for those Africans, who, not being of their own particular race, attempt to administer their territories, unless such natives are acting under European direction. With their own hereditary chieftains and headmen it is a different matter. In the case of Liberia, therefore, the task of the educated coastal native has been exceedingly difficult. With inadequate financial resources, and with the inertia, if not the active hostility or contempt, of the interior natives to overcome, it is no matter for wonder that the development of Liberia has been retarded instead of advanced by that very political freedom which is the most cherished possession of European races.

For this reason therefore American administrators have an almost unique opportunity in Liberia; and if they are able to train the Liberians to govern themselves they will have rendered a real service to the cause of West Africa.

They will, moreover, have provided an object lesson as effective in its way as that offered by the British administrations in Nigeria and the Gold Coast.

In Liberia it is entirely a matter of educating the natives of the interior in agricultural work and convincing them that their economic independence is intimately connected with the development of their own lands and resources. If they are once convinced that there is no danger of their becoming merely the hewers of wood and drawers of water for a dominant caste, be it European or native, and that their lands will be respected and their customs, so far as they do not actively conflict with the higher ethical teachings, will not be interfered with the task of administration will be comparatively easy.

Because of our long-time relationship with and interest in Liberia, because of the present circumstances, financial and industrial, existing in Liberia, I think it a duty, a moral obligation resting on the United States, and not because of any commitments or any establishment of credit, to make this loan under the supervision provided for under the treaty between the Secretary of State and the Liberian Government. The Liberian Government is at the present time somewhat demoralized and disorganized, if I am correctly informed; it is subject to the criticism of Great Britain and of France, and out of the present unsettled conditions in Liberia may easily grow friction or controversy of a serious kind between the Liberian Government and those who hold colonies near or bounding upon Liberia, like Great Britain and France. I think we will render great aid to Liberia and to the cause of West Africa itself by giving financial aid and establishing a financial administration there of the kind proposed in the joint resolution.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Ernst	King	Sheppard
Broussard	Fletcher	McNary	Shields
Bursum	France	Moses	Stanfield
Cameron	Glass	Nelson	Sterling
Capper	Gooding	New	Sutherland
Colt	Hale	Oddie	Swanson
Cummins	Harrison	Owen	Underwood
Curtis	Heflin	Phipps	Watson, Ga.
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Ransdell	Willis
du Pont	Kellogg	Reed, Pa.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Assistant Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and the following Senators answered to their names when called:

Lenroot	Rawson	Smoot	Watson, Ind.
McCumber

The following Senators entered the Chamber, and answered to their names:

Borah	Myers	Simmons	Walsh, Mass.
Harreld

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, in connection with the adoption of the Borah amendment providing an appropriation to carry on irrigation and reclamation work in the West, I merely desire to call the attention of western Senators on the other side of the aisle and of the people of the West to the fact that 22 Republican Senators voted against that appropriation, which meant so much to the great western section of the country, and that only 13 Republican Senators voted for that amendment. I desire to incorporate in the RECORD the names of those Senators who opposed that measure in which the West is so deeply interested in order that they "may be inscribed on the tablets of memory." They are as follows—I read from the official roll call; the ink is not yet dry:

BALL, of Delaware, one of the leaders here on the other side, voted against it.

BRANDEGEE, who has just returned from Connecticut, where he made a big Republican speech as chairman of the State Republican convention.

CAPPER, of Kansas. Well, I can only smile at the junior Senator from Kansas as I now look upon his benign countenance.

COLT, of Rhode Island. His regularity to Republican leadership causes that.

CURTIS, the leader of leaders on the floor of the Senate, who when he speaks speaks with authority, and who made such an eloquent speech the other day against reclamation in the West. But, my, why did he carry his colleague with it? That is one time his hypnotic influence got in its work.

DILLINGHAM. Well, that was to be expected.

DU PONT, of Delaware fame. Of course, he wanted to stand in one instance with his colleague, the other Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL].

ERNST, of Kentucky.

FRANCE, who is coming before the people in Maryland in November, was against it.

HALE, who has just been honored, away up amid the crags and reefs of Maine, by a very small majority. [Laughter.]

HARRELD, of Oklahoma, one of the great progressive States out West, which needs some irrigation and reclamation, as well as fumigation.

KELLOGG, of Minnesota, who has been reputed to be a Progressive as well as a reactionary.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, does the Senator mean to say that Oklahoma needs rejuvenation or the Democratic Party in Oklahoma?

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator misunderstood me. I did not say "intoxication," I said "fumigation," for his State.

MCCUMBER, one of the great leaders here, who has forsaken the West because the West forsook him.

MCLEAN, one of the leaders, an influential member of the Finance Committee. He is against his Republican colleagues from the West when it comes to reclamation.

MOSES—he does not want to lead his brethren or party out of the wilderness. He prefers to lead them into it when he votes this way.

NELSON, from away out West, against reclamation.

NEW—well, I withhold my comment.

PHIPPS—one who comes from away out West; PHIPPS, who is not before the people of Colorado for reelection this year, but who will come before them some day, and who will have to take most of his time before his constituents in explaining the vote that he cast to-day against this appropriation of $20,000,000 for reclamation.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. PHIPPS. I hope explaining that vote will be my hardest task.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator will have to explain even that interruption. His heart is so hardened and his ears so deaf to the interests and cries of the people of Colorado that when I stand here attempting to help him and his people and section he takes issue with me.

RAWSON—not so far west as some of the others, but Iowa is classed sometimes as a Republican State, though not this year; sometimes as a progressive State, but not very much in recent years. He voted against it.

REED of Pennsylvania—so soon after his entrance into the Senate he is beginning to go wrong on such a vital proposition.

SUTHERLAND, whose people may not need irrigation or reclamation, but he will have to explain to them next month, as he goes before them, why he did not join with his Republican colleagues from the West and the united elements on this side of the aisle to do something for the crying needs of the great western country.

WILLIS, who succeeded the present President of the United States, and from whom the people in the far West expected help and assistance—he stumbles and falls by the wayside and votes against their interests.

Mr. President, that is not all. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] knew he was right when he said that the Republican leadership was against reclamation for the West. When he brought the indictment, he was correct. What happened in the House to-day? It is fresh in your memory, but it will be history to-morrow; and every Representative from the West of the majority party who graces a seat in the House of Representatives must explain why, when the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill in its report went to the House to-day, they failed to make a motion, as they had a right to do under the rules of the House, instructing the conferees upon the part of the House to recede from the House disagreement and to accept the McNary amendment adopted in the Senate. They could have taken that course, but not a western Republican Representative raised his voice to make that motion in the other body; but they saw the McNary amendment stricken from the conference report, and this great hope of the West disappeared from view. These things must be explained in the coming campaign.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator can offer a good explanation, I yield.

Mr. FRANCE. I will ask my friend the Senator from Mississippi if it is his theory that the votes of the American people can be bought by appropriations? If so, I would remind the Senator that that is a very ancient and entirely exploded theory.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Mississippi has not charged that votes can be purchased by legislation; but the Senator from Mississippi was trying to impress upon the Senator from Maryland and other Senators here that when you have promised to a people, or a part of a people, or a section of this great country legislation that they need, you ought to live up to it, and not repudiate it time after time when you have an opportunity to live up to it. Although your party in its platform enunciated in the strongest language for irrigation and reclamation legislation, when you had an opportunity to accept it and give it to the people and live up in part to your pledges, at least in that one instance, you repudiate it.

May I say to the distinguished Senator from Maryland, for whom I have the highest and kindest regard, that if his idea is that you can slap the people of Maryland in the face and repudiate plank after plank in your national platform and promise after promise that you have made to the people of Maryland in the belief that perhaps that is a way to purchase votes, the Senator will be overwhelmingly defeated when the ides of November roll around.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. No; it is not purchasing votes by passing legislation. It is redeeming your pledge; it is making good on your promises; and that is what you ought to do unless you are a gang of deceitful political hypocrites.

Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator does not mean to state that I have failed to keep any of my pledges or promises.

Mr. HARRISON. I will say to the Senator that I have not time this afternoon—although I have the inclination, and I think I have the facts to back me up—to show that the Senator's record here does carry out that assertion. I need only mention the fact that I could almost hear the pleasing and eloquent voice of my friend from Maryland as he spoke in Baltimore, as I would go to my home from this Capitol, as he promised the people that he would help to reduce the high cost of living; and yet, when the tariff bill rolled around, with item after item in it that piled additional burdens on the already stooped shoulders of the American consumer, increasing the costs of living as never before attempted, he forgets his promises and votes for the robbery.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, as a matter of fact, I did not make any such promise.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator did not promise to help reduce the high cost of living?

Mr. FRANCE. No; I never made any such promise.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, the Senator is the exception among all Republican Senators, then.

Mr. FRANCE. I always promise less than I perform, and I would not promise to interfere with the economic laws which have increased the cost of living. It was the Democratic Party, I believe, which promised to reduce the cost of living.

Mr. HARRISON. We have tried to do it here, and we have been forestalled and thwarted at every attempt we made. It has been the Democratic minority in the House and Senate that have tried to relieve the American consumers of the high and unconscionable taxes.

Mr. FRANCE. The Democratic Party were in power for a number of years without reducing the cost of living. My theory is that the only way to reduce the cost of living is to increase production, and during the Democratic administration I was pleading continually for measures which would stimulate production. It was the theory of the Democrats that you can reduce the cost of living by legislation, as was indicated by the passage of the food control bill. I thought that bill was unwise, and I urged, in place of that, legislation to stimulate agricultural production, believing that the cure for the high cost of food was the production of more food.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator may not have promised his constituents in Maryland to help to reduce the high cost of living, but I hold in my hand the Republican Party platform, and I have in my drawer in front of me pamphlet after pamphlet on the high cost of living issued by the Republican campaign committee. I shall not burden the Senate by a repetition of those utterances and those expressions—yea, promises—but I never thought that even a Republican would now deny that you promised to assist in reducing the high cost of living. I dare say that the Senator from Maryland is the exception in this Chamber, and that he is the only one of all the Republicans who went before the people in the last election who did not say they would use their efforts and their influence to reduce the high cost of living.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, my good friend, the Senator from Mississippi, has now changed his statement entirely. It has been the purpose of the Republican Party to benefit all of the people by legislation which would bring about healthful economic conditions, which, of course, would tend toward the reduction of the cost of living and the increase in the earning power of the people; but to promise barely and baldly a reduction in the cost of living is something which, I think, my party never did. However, we are all pledged now to do all that we can in that direction, and we have already accomplished much in that direction.

Mr. HARRISON. While the Senator is on his feet in this colloquy with me, does he think that the imposition of a 50 to 100 per cent duty on sugar, or approximately that, helps reduce the cost of sugar to the American sugar consumer?

Mr. FRANCE. That is a very difficult question to answer.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; it is difficult for a Republican to answer.

Mr. FRANCE. But it is true that the imposition of a tariff has in many instances resulted in a lowering of the price of the product. I can cite one instance in this last tariff bill of ours where a certain industry was buying a certain commodity abroad. Finally a combination was formed in Europe which raised the price of that particular product so that the American industry could not purchase it. Then the American industry began to manufacture this article for its own use; and undoubtedly it will be true that when that article is manufactured in this country, and we cease to be entirely dependent upon Europe, we will have a supply of our own, and there may be a reduction in the price as a result of that. There are many articles for which Europe asks us a very high price because we have no way of supplying those articles here, and there are many instances where a reduction in price has come about as the result of the building up of an industry here under a protective tariff.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator another question before he takes his seat? I do not care to go into the thousand and one specific articles where your party sought to increase the cost of those articles to the American consumer by the imposition of a tariff; but will not the Senator in all fairness, now—not in a partisan way, but dispassionately, may I say—will not the Senator admit that the tendency of the rates imposed in the tariff bill was to increase the cost of living to the American consumer?

Mr. FRANCE. I would say that I did not intend to get into any prolonged debate——

Mr. HARRISON. It would not take long to answer that question.

Mr. FRANCE. Unfortunately, my voice is in such a condition——

Mr. HARRISON. I will lend the Senator my voice if he will just answer that question.

Mr. FRANCE. I have been spending many days in telling the people of Maryland that I have kept my pledges, and they have been kind enough to admit that at a recent primary election.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator either made them believe it or he fooled them.

Mr. FRANCE. I have never attempted to fool the people.

Mr. HARRISON. I said that, judging from the results of that election, he either made the people believe that he kept his pledges or he fooled them.

Mr. FRANCE. In my public life I have always avoided the policy of attempting to fool the people. I deal with them in a straightforward way, and then abide by the result.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator made them believe it then.

Mr. FRANCE. Made them believe what?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want to get the Senator away from answering my question. He was explaining that the reason he did not answer the question I propounded was that he had been speaking in Maryland, and I am afraid that if he talks too long now he will not have enough voice to answer my question, so I will not interrupt him any longer; I will just wait for the answer.

Mr. FRANCE. It seems to be useless for the Senator from Mississippi and myself to engage in a debate upon the theory of the protective tariff at this time. If the Senator from Mississippi were fair he would recognize the fact that the cost of many articles has been ultimately reduced as a result of building up industries in this country by means of a protective tariff. I could cite many instances of that.

Mr. HARRISON. Before the Senator takes his seat, let me propound a query. I do not want to ask a complicated question, and I did not invite this colloquy, but it is a simple proposition I desire to get an answer to. Does not the Senator think that, on the whole, the high rates imposed in the pending tariff bill would have a tendency to and will bring about an increased cost of living to American consumers?

Mr. FRANCE. That is a very difficult question to answer. There are two factors to be considered in any inquiry into the cost of living. There is the question of the income, and there is the question of the price of the article. We have the real wage and the nominal wage. The real wage is the wage which expresses the purchasing power of the dollar. The nominal wage is the actual amount of money received. It is quite possible that the prices of certain articles might be advanced by a tariff, while at the same time the purchasing power of the dollar might be increased so much out of proportion that the cost of living would actually be reduced. That has happened in a number of instances.

The theory of the protective tariff is that we should maintain the income of the American people and build up industry at home; that, as the result of that process, not only would the income of the American workingman be maintained, but that the prices of the articles which he had to buy would ultimately be reduced as the result of competition at home. Of course, that is the whole theory of the tariff. I discussed this question at some length on a previous occasion. I would say, however, that I am not myself an extremely high-tariff man. I believe in moderate tariff for adequate protection of industry without the erection of a tariff wall. I recognize the fact contended for by the Senator from Mississippi, that if we do not buy, we can not sell, and that international trade is based upon the exchange of commodities. Therefore I would not favor the erection of a tariff wall under ordinary circumstances, but I do favor a moderate protective tariff.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand the Senator's answer is that on some articles the rates imposed tend to increase the cost of living to the American consumer, and that the rates imposed on other articles would not affect it; that there are other causes which would enter into it.

Mr. FRANCE. Of course, such a tariff bill as this, at such a time as this, is more or less of an experiment. It was very difficult to determine what were the proper rates. Some of the rates may be too high, some of them may be too low. In some instances I thought the rates were rather high; in some instances I thought they were too low. The whole question is a most difficult one, and one which we could hardly settle this afternoon.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to congratulate the Senator for the fullness, and the candor, and the frankness of his expression in answer to my question. No one could have been more lucid in his answer. My own mind is just as muddy now as to his position as it was when I first started out.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Mississippi does not at all understand the theory of a protective tariff, and I can not hope to clarify the muddiness of his mind on that subject.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator hypnotizes me with the force of his logic. I wanted to discuss the pending amendment to the bill, and I was wondering whether the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] was going to insist on going on this afternoon. If he does, and we are going to get a vote on the proposition, I shall proceed to discuss it; but this is an amendment in which I am very much interested. I feel very strongly that it should be adopted, and if the Senator does not desire to have an executive session at this time——

Mr. CURTIS. I do not want an executive session at this time; it is too early. The Senator had better go ahead.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, will not the Senator let us get a vote on his amendment and upon the joint resolution?

Mr. HARRISON. I am afraid that the Senator would vote against it in his present frame of mind, and I am sure that after he has heard me he will vote for it.

Mr. President, the amendment I have offered seeks to appropriate a hundred thousand dollars. That is a small sum, very small, when compared to the $5,000,000 we are asked to give to the colored population of Liberia; but a hundred thousand dollars is the amount we seek to have appropriated to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to appoint "such additional number of inspectors of locomotive boilers under the provisions of the act," and so forth, as may be necessary to meet the present emergency.

I have offered this amendment because we have waited for weeks and weeks for the House of Representatives to make an appropriation to carry out this work. They should have made it, or this body should have made it, but I realize, as I am sure the country will, that appropriations should originate ordinarily in the House of Representatives.

The President of the United States came to Congress some weeks ago and discussed the strike crisis—on August 18, 1922. Among other things in that speech he said:

> Under these conditions of hindrance and intimidation there has been such a lack of care of motive power that the deterioration of locomotives and the noncompliance with the safety requirements of the law are threatening the breakdown of transportation.

There are now, I believe, 50 of these inspectors throughout the United States to inspect the boilers of locomotives, to see that they are safe and that the lives of passengers and the traveling public generally are not endangered by virtue of any defects in the locomotives. I have here data with reference to certain facts which I am quite sure would convince anyone that there are not a sufficient number of inspectors to properly inspect the locomotives in the country. I pause at this time, merely that the RECORD might record the fact, to state that although the people are very greatly interested in the safety of the general public when they travel from place to place, they are interested in having locomotives up-to-date, well kept, and thoroughly repaired to carry commerce from place to place, and there is a general breakdown all over the country, there are only three Senators on the Republican side now in their seats—the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE]. The other Senators will come in when this amendment is to be voted on, and perhaps vote against it, not knowing what it is, not remaining here to receive any explanation of it, or to give any consideration to it. Yet the lives of the American people are endangered by the failure of the American Congress to provide an adequate number of inspectors to inspect the motive power of the railroads of the country. If to-night, through some defect in the boiler of a locomotive or some weakness elsewhere in the locomotive, a terrible catastrophe should occur and a hundred or more American lives dashed into eternity, then, sirs, you would wake up. We sometimes wait too long, and very often it takes some horrible occurrence, some accident, that if attended to in time might have been prevented, before we realize the situation.

The firemen, the engineers, the railroad and Government employees, as well as the traveling public, are endangering their lives minutely when trains are operated without proper inspection. They look to us for relief in the present situation, and relief we should give.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I think the amendment of the Senator has much merit, and if he would offer it at the proper time and at the proper place, it would have my support. I do not see its relevancy as an amendment to this joint resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator makes that statement in good faith. Just a word on that proposition.

The Senator said he would be for the amendment if it were offered at the proper place. Of course, the proper place is the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives should pass on the proposition first after it shall have been reported out of the Appropriations Committee of the House. The House has not done that. It is under the control of the Senator's party. Weeks and weeks and weeks have passed since the President of the United States came before the two Houses of Congress, and days have passed since the Interstate Commerce Commission filed their report in answer to a resolution passed by the Senate touching upon the conditions of the motive power of the railroads, and nothing is yet done. There will be no other appropriation bill before Congress before it adjourns. We hear it rumored that as soon as the conference report on the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill is out of the way, and as soon as the conference report on the tariff bill is out of the way, this session of Congress will adjourn. What hope is there for anything to come from the House of Representatives in the form of an appropriation to take care of this situation?

Under the rules of the Senate this amendment is in order. If the pending joint resolution passes it will go back to the House, a motion will be made to concur in the Senate amendment, and the Liberian loan bill is finally passed, and goes to the President, it will become a law. This is the only means I know of to get this appropriation into the law. If any other opportunity is to be presented to the Senate, I do not know from what source it will come, or when it will come, and so one with authority has said it will come. If I am told now by one in authority that before Congress adjourns the majority party will make an appropriation to take care of this situation, then I will withdraw my amendment now. But now is the time, and the Senator and other Senators, may I say, can not excuse themselves for not voting for this on the ground that it is improper to tie it up with this Liberian loan proposition.

The question that should confront the Senator and the Senate and the House is whether or not the facts warrant the additional number of inspectors to inspect the locomotives in the country that the lives of the traveling public may not be further endangered. If they are not needed, then, of course, the Senator should vote against it, but do not do it on the technical ground that the proposition has no business in the Liberian loan measure.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I intend to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi, although his amendment does not reach the trouble which we have experienced in the last year or two. I have been attempting for a year and a half to have the number of inspectors increased from 50 to 100, to increase their compensation, and to increase the allowance that is made to them for office rent and help in the office. I have been utterly unable to secure consideration by anybody for an amendment of that sort.

The difficulty with the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi is—and I might as well point it out——

Mr. HARRISON. I shall be glad if the Senator does so, and I shall accept any suggestion along that line made by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. It gives the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to appoint any number of inspectors. I think they ought to have authority to appoint—not during the emergency, but permanently—50 additional inspectors. I do not believe that it is fair to the men who are selected as locomotive inspectors to limit their compensation to $1,800. I think it is unfair to limit their allowance for office rent and office help to $600 a year. Who is to determine when the emergency has passed? We have never given to the Interstate Commerce Commission any authority to declare an emergency with reference to locomotive-boiler or locomotive inspection.

I wish that the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi constituted a permanent addition to the interstate commerce law. The present law is a part of the interstate commerce act. It was enacted in 1911 and was then limited to the inspection of locomotive boilers alone. It was amended two or three years later to embrace the inspection of all parts of a locomotive, and that is the present law.

But, imperfect as the amendment is, I intend to vote for it because I know that nothing in the interstate commerce law has added more to the safety of passengers upon trains and of employees upon trains than the inspection which we required in 1911 and have since enlarged as I have suggested.

I felt that it was due to the Senator from Mississippi that I should state what I have now stated.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator from Iowa that I am very glad he has stated what he has and I welcome, and very sincerely welcome, the suggestions which he has made. Of course the Senator understands that the amendment which I have offered is merely to take care of an emergency situation. I think that the 50 inspectors are totally inadequate and that the provision should be made permanent. I agree with the Senator that salaries should be increased from the present status. I am perfectly willing to agree to any substitute that might carry out the Senator's suggestions, because I respect his views more than that of any other Senator on the question of railroad transportation.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. Unless the suggestions are made they can not be incorporated. I know the amendment will do this if it becomes the law: It will provide for $100,000 or such portion of that amount as is necessary in the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission to provide for additional inspectors, and the amount obtained will be immediately available, and the present emergency, which is pressing, will be taken care of. So I shall press that proposition unless we can agree upon a permanent proposition.

I now yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS: In view of the fact that an estimate has been sent to the Congress by the Interstate Commerce Commission through the Budget and is now pending in the House before the Committee on Appropriations, I suggest that it would perhaps be better for the Senator to withdraw his amendment and let the matter come over either in a deficiency bill now or immediately after we meet later. I am told, though I can not promise, that there will probably be a deficiency bill before we adjourn. I would not like to say that positively, because I do not know it.

Mr. HARRISON. If I was sure there was to be a deficiency bill before we adjourn and that this proposition will be taken care of, I would withdraw the amendment. But in view of the fact that the deficiency bill will perhaps be passed, it would do no harm for the Senate to have some provision—I do not care whether it is my amendment or not—that would carry out the idea, because the joint resolution would have to go to conference and be considered there a while, and in the meanwhile the Senate leaders will know whether a deficiency bill is going to be passed. If the deficiency, we can take care of the situation in this way. If the deficiency is passed, we can easily in conference eliminate this amendment from the pending resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. In view of the fact that an attempt is now being made in the House, I do not think it would be right and proper for us to put the amendment on the pending measure, which is foreign to the subject the Senator has in mind. It ought to go on an appropriation bill in the regular way.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with the Senator from Kansas that it would be very much better if it went through the regular way. But our appropriation for the enforcement of the act, together with one or two other safety appliance acts, has been formerly $300,000 a year. The Budget, or some one in authority—I have not gotten my mind entirely around the Budget system yet—cut the usual and ordinary appropriation down to $290,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Some farmer up there did that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I protested very earnestly against the reduction of the appropriation, but until this moment I have never been able to get the assent or approval of any Member of the Senate, either Republican or Democrat, and I think that ought to be understood at this time.

Mr. HARRISON. In answer to the proposition or suggestion of the Senator from Kansas to wait for an appropriation bill, he frankly says that he does not know that a deficiency bill will come over. If it does not come over, then what is the situation? This is September. We must wait through the months of October and November and come back in December and then wait for it to pass, perhaps, before the Christmas holidays. That would be two or three months. In the meanwhile the faithful and trusted employees on the railroads as well as the traveling public are endangering their lives.

Here are some figures I want to submit to the Senate in this connection: On July 1, this year, the number of engines requiring heavy repairs was 10,806; on July 15, 15 days later, the number was 11,741. On August 1, 15 days later, the number had increased to 14,006. On August 15 the number had increased to 15,060. According to that proportion there would be approximately 17,000 by this time.

Those were locomotives requiring heavy repairs. The number requiring light repairs on July 1 was 3,090; on July 5, 3,506; on August 1, 3,567; and on August 15, 3,658. The percentage of increase on the total on July 1 was 22.2 per cent; July 15, 24.7 per cent; August 1, 28.5 per cent; August 15, 30.3 per cent. The increase from July 1 to August 15 this year of locomotives requiring heavy repairs was 4,254. The total increase during the same period was 4,802. This clearly shows that as the strike continues the motive power of the railroads is becoming alarmingly defective. And the longer the work by those competent to repair the locomotives is delayed the larger will be the increase in the number of locomotives thrown out of use and the greater the handicap to the traveling and shipping public.

This question is one of such moment that the Congress should be glad to hasten consideration of a measure such as this that might remedy the situation.

Mr. CURTIS. I have just been advised that a deficiency bill is now being considered by the Appropriations Committee of the House and will likely be reported out before Saturday. They are waiting to get a report from the conferees on the coal bills.

Mr. HARRISON. In view of that statement, does not the Senator think the Senate might well let the amendment go on the joint resolution and go to conference and then, if the appropriation is carried in the deficiency bill, be stricken out in conference?

Mr. CURTIS. My judgment is, in view of that statement, that the Senator should withdraw his amendment, and if it is not properly put on the deficiency bill, either let the committee consider it in committee when the deficiency bill is up or let the Senator offer the estimate as it came from the department. There is an official estimate on it.

Mr. HARRISON. Before Congress adjourns, and can we then pass it?

Mr. CURTIS. That is my judgment. I am not saying to the Senator that the House will send a deficiency bill over here——

Mr. HARRISON. That is the trouble.

Mr. CURTIS. I am advised by the clerk of the committee that they think it will pass by Saturday.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I am more anxious than anybody to see the law enacted in this respect, but I desire to say to the Senator from Mississippi that the figures or statistics which he has given are disputed. He must remember, too—because I want to do justice to everybody—that the work of the inspector is to inspect the engine and if he finds it in bad order to order it out of service. It is not pretended that any such number of engines as the Senator has stated from the paper which he holds in his hand have been ordered out of the service or would be ordered out of service upon inspection by Federal inspectors.

Mr. HARRISON. I said that some were heavy repairs and some light repairs. As I understand from the explanation I received, the heavy repairs mean repairs which will take one man working 20 hours or more to accomplish, and light repairs are those which would take one man less than 20 hours to make.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not been advised that heavy repairs were classified in just that way.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand in railroad parlance it is that way, that heavy repairs are those which take one man working 20 hours or more to make, meaning, of course, a man who is trained and qualified to do that kind of work.

Mr. CUMMINS. My information is that heavy repairs require more time than the time given by the Senator from Mississippi. However, that is immaterial.

Mr. HARRISON. It might be a great deal longer than 20 hours, but when it does require one man more than 20 hours it is then, as I understand, known as heavy repairs. It might take six months, which would come within the category I have stated.

I desire to say further that the number of locomotives inspected during the month of August, 1921, was 6,065, and in the month of August, 1922, it was 6,105. The number found defective in August, 1921, was 2,868, and the number found defective in August, 1922, was 4,355, an increase of approximately 2,000 in the month of August, 1922, over the month of August, 1921. Why, sirs, in August, 1921, only 316 locomotives were ordered out of the service. In August, 1922, there were 464, an increase during the same period within a year of 148 locomotives.

Mr. CUMMINS. Let me make an inquiry. Is that based upon a report of the inspection by the Federal inspectors or by inspectors of the railroad companies themselves?

Mr. HARRISON. As I understand, not by the railroad companies themselves.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator knows that it is the duty of the railroad companies to report, I think, every two weeks or at least every month the number of inspections and the result of the inspections which they make. That ought not to be confused with inspections made by the Federal inspectors. The truth is that during the strike, or during a part of the strike, as I am advised, the railroad companies have almost ceased to inspect their locomotives. I do not mean that literally, but that they either have not had an opportunity or that they have found their locomotives in such bad condition that they did not care to report them.

Mr. HARRISON. That is my information also; but I merely cite this to show that there are approximately the same inspections made at this time as were made a year ago, even though conditions are quite different, and the number of locomotives that need repair and are found defective is almost double what it was during the same period a year ago. For instance, the percentage of locomotives inspected and found defective in August, 1921, was 47 per cent; in August, 1922, the number found defective was 71 per cent; the number of inspections made in August, 1921, was 928, and in August, 1922, it was only 987. So there is no question that, with the conditions that to-day confront the American people and the railroads generally, there should be more inspections; there should be an enforcement of the law; and Congress could do nothing that would really bring more benefit and safety to the general public than to provide an adequate number of inspectors, so that defective engines may be inspected and repaired, if they can be, or thrown out of use if they can not be remodeled and repaired. I shall ask for a vote on the amendment when the time comes.

I now offer and ask to have incorporated in the RECORD, following my remarks, a memorandum bearing upon the subject which I have been discussing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The memorandum referred to is as follows:

The progressive deterioration in the condition of freight-train cars since the close of Federal control is shown by the following figures:

On March 1, 1920, there was a total of 141,906 bad-order freight cars, of which 78,980 required heavy repairs and 62,926 required light repairs.

On July 15, 1922, there were 342,079 bad-order freight cars. Of these, 271,401 required heavy repairs and 70,678 required light repairs.

It will be noted that there was a very small increase in the number of cars out of service for light repairs, practically all of the tremendous increase in the number of bad-order cars being cars which required heavy repairs.

To maintain the freight-train cars of the country in a serviceable condition not less than 75,000 must be given repairs each working day. Of these, about 68,000 should be light repairs and 7,000 heavy repairs.

If we are to assume that the number given heavy repairs has decreased 50 per cent, there are at present more than 450,000 freight-train cars which must be given heavy repairs before they are serviceable.

Cars requiring light repairs can be kept in service, although not perhaps in a safe and suitable condition for service, but there can be no doubt that at the present time there are more than 1,000,000 cars in service which should be repaired, approximately half of which should have heavy repairs.

To maintain locomotives in a condition for service approximately 1,000 locomotives must be given repairs requiring more than 24 hours each working day. Five thousand locomotives must be given classified repairs, which are more extensive, and cost from $3,000 to $20,000 each. Neglecting these repairs will bring about similar results as neglecting freight-train car repairs, i. e., the number requiring repairs will progressively increase. The fact that minor repairs are not made promptly usually results in more extensive repairs being required at an earlier date than usual.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I think the proposition covered by the amendment submitted by the Senator from Mississippi ought to be taken up and considered in the regular way. The Interstate Commerce Commission, through the President and the Bureau of the Budget, has sent to the other House, where such appropriations ordinarily originate, an estimate of the amount of money which they desire appropriated for additional inspectors. The House Committee on Appropriations is now considering that question. It is expected that a deficiency appropriation bill will pass that body before Saturday next and that it will become a law before Congress adjourns. So far as I am concerned, speaking as one of the members of the Committee on Appropriations and as one of the members of the subcommittee of that committee having immediate jurisdiction of such questions, I desire to say that I intend to vote to give to the Interstate Commerce Commission all the money they need for this purpose, but I do not think it fair to seek to attach an amendment of this kind to the pending measure. I shall vote against it being placed on this measure, and I hope the amendment, if insisted upon, may be defeated.

I merely wish to say a word in response to what the Senator from Mississippi has said about the vote of the Republicans on the reclamation amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. It was very kind of the Senator to read the names of Republican Senators who voted against that amendment, but he entirely forgot to tell the Senate that quite a number of Senators upon his side of the Chamber voted to add that amendment to the joint resolution in the hope of defeating the whole measure.

What is the record of the Republican Party upon the question of irrigation? The original proposal putting into effect the irrigation policy was submitted and passed in 1902 by a Congress Republican in House and Senate and it was signed by a Republican President. Since that time the only substantial aid which has been given to the work of reclamation was in 1920, when again a Congress Republican in House and Senate voted a $20,000,000 loan to the irrigation fund, and that measure, too, was signed by a Republican President. The Republican Party originated and carried into effect the policy of reclaiming our arid lands. Senators on the other side of the Chamber stand here and talk about irrigation being the child of the late Senator Newlands. We all knew Senator Newlands and what he stood for in the House and in the Senate, but the reclamation policy as carried into effect was not the Newlands proposition. It originated in the Senate before Senator Newlands was a Member of this bdoy. Senator Newlands did not come to this body until 1903, while the irrigation policy as we now know it originated in the Senate in 1902, and was the Hansbrough proposition and not the Newlands proposition.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator will permit me, I desire also to state as a fact and not for the purpose of detracting from the work of Senator Newlands or anybody else——

Mr. CURTIS. I did not intend to detract from the services of anyone. I know how earnestly Senator Newlands worked for reclamation and all that. He had a wonderful record in that regard.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I knew the Senator from Kansas did not intend to do so, and I make that statement in view of what I am going to state.

I desire to say that the present reclamation law was drafted by a committee of 17, which was composed of one member from each of the public-land States and was introduced in the Senate after that draft had been made by that committee, of which I had the honor to be a member, as representing the State of Washington. The measure was then introduced in the Senate by Senator Newlands and in the House of Representatives by Representative MONDELL.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to add further that I voted against the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho to the pending joint resolution because I believed it had no place upon the measure. I think it has been used as a vehicle to help defeat the measure. I hope that the intention will not succeed, because I for one propose, although I do not think the amendment should be attached to it, to vote for the joint resolution even with the amendment added, and to do all that I can to have it become a law.

I hope, however—and this is all I intend to say on the subject—that the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] will be defeated, because it has no place on the measure now pending. It ought to go into the deficiency bill that will soon come here from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] calls for an appropriation of only $100,000, while the joint resolution now pending before the Senate calls for a loan of $5,000,000, although the hearings disclose that a large part of that money is to go to private individuals, certain financiers in Wall Street. Human life, Mr. President, must be exceedingly cheap in the estimation of some people when they are not willing to vote an appropriation of $100,000 to provide competent inspectors in sufficient numbers to examine into the condition of the engines and rolling stock of the railroads and ascertain whether or not they are safe for the transportation of individuals. Why is it that we can not get such a measure as that through here? How small is the $100,000 proposed to be appropriated by the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi compared to the $5,000,000 which the majority party are undertaking to put through, so that the slick-fingered fellows in Wall Street may get hold of it, as they will do in short order whenever it is provided.

Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has convinced every one who has listened to him that we are not obligated in any way to advance $5,000,000 to Liberia; but the pressure that is being brought to bear from certain points in the East, through pipe-line connection between Wall Street and the Congress of the country, seems to be bearing fruit on every questionable measure that comes up here. I really can not conceive how any Senator can seriously consider the proposed loan to Liberia, and yet on the part of some there seems to be an enthusiastic and determined effort to put it through.

While it is pending, the Senator from Mississippi offers an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for the benefit of all the men, women, and children of the United States who travel on trains, and yet Senators quibble about whether the pending measure is the proper place for such an amendment; they hum and haw and halt in their support of a proposition like this, and want to postpone it, and put it off. A few years ago the Republican Party earned the very appropriate title of being the postponing party. It loves to postpone action. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] said a while ago that he tried to live up to the promises that he made. If there is anything on this earth, Mr. President, that is good at promising it is a Republican running for office. When you see a citizen, man or woman, approach one of them on the highway and commence asking him if he will be for this or if he will be for that, he bows and smiles all the time he is talking and never loses an opportunity to promise, but when he gets into office he reminds me of Thomas Moore's poem paraphrased:

> Bees on flowers alighting cease their hum,
> And Republicans in office soon grow dumb.

[Laughter.]

Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland, I believe, voted against the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho proposing to appropriate $20,000,000 for irrigation projects in the West. The Senator voted to give outright to Russia, a country across the sea, $20,000,000. Here the farmers of the West are hard pressed, in distress, and unable to pay their taxes under the Republican administration, and the Senator from Idaho is asking for an appropriation of $20,000,000—to do what? To loan to those distressed people—not to give them, if you please, as was done in the instance of Russia—this fund, as funds have been loaned heretofore, to be repaid as the beneficiaries of similar funds in the past have made repayment, they having paid millions of dollars back to the Government. This great democratic project now is about to be neglected and cast aside.

The Senator from Kansas undertakes to claim the credit for the inauguration of the policy of irrigation for some Republican. Mr. President, the fact that some fellow introduced a bill does not give the credit to the side or to the party to which he belongs, because a bill is frequently introduced because of the pressure that is brought to bear when the gentleman introducing it does not intend to push it or intend that it shall become a law. Democrats, however, go to work in earnest to bring about legislation; they initiate wise movements and fight to get their bills through. They want to put them on the statute books, so that the people may be blessed and benefited by them. Mr. President, whenever you see a Republican politician introducing a bill you may know that great pressure has been brought to bear on him or that he is running for office and election day is near at hand.

When the Senator from Maryland in his colloquy with the Senator from Mississippi was telling us how he voted for certain measures and looked out for the interest of the people of his State, I was just thinking of that monstrous tariff bill for which he voted a few days ago. This champion of the common people from the sister State of Maryland voted for a bill that put a tax on brick, on the dust of the earth worked up in water and molded in the form of a brick, to build houses and chimneys. The Senator from Maryland voted for a bill that contains in it a tax on brick and mortar. And that is not all, Mr. President. That bill contains a tax on cement. Cement? Why, we build bridges with it now. We span the little branches and the creeks and the rivers with bridges made of cement. We build roads leading from farm to market with cement. We build houses with cement. There is scarcely anything quite so much in common use amongst the masses as cement. I fought the tax when it was up in the Senate, and others here fought it and voted against it; but the Senator from Maryland votes for a bill that has in it a tax on cement.

Mr. President, he does not stop there. The Bible speaks about the sands of the sea, and the Senator from Maryland has voted for a bill that taxes the sands of the sea. The quantity of sand is almost as limitless as the air that we breathe and the water that we drink, and yet the Senator from Maryland voted for a tariff bill that has in it a tax on sand; and this sand is used to make glass, drinking glasses, spectacles through which we read—eyeglasses, if you please. It is used to make window-panes. It lets light into this Chamber, where, God knows, under Republican rule it is very much needed.

Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland voted for a bill that puts a tax on this sand of the sea used to make glass. Every man and woman in Maryland who has to use glass to put in the window or use drinking glasses, or any kind of glass about the home, is going to have to pay a higher price by reason of the vote cast by the Senator from Maryland to tax sand out of which glass is made.

That is not all, Mr. President. When his constituents come into the dining room to sit down to a meal the knife and fork with which they eat are taxed under the bill that has the sanction of the Senator from Maryland. He voted for a bill that taxed the knives and the forks with which the people eat their meals in America. Who ever would have thought that a pious-looking, mild-mannered Senator like the Senator from Maryland would have grown so vicious and cruel-hearted all of a sudden as to vote a tax upon a knife and fork. That is the record of the Senator from Maryland.

That is not all. At certain seasons of the year the sheep that graze in his State, that nip the tender blades of grass and crop the flowery food in the meadows, are brought up and shorn of their wool. They call it sheep-shearing time, and they use these sheep shears in clipping the wool from the sheep, and the Senator from Maryland has voted for a bill that puts a tax on sheep shears.

That is not all. As you drive through the magnificent State of Maryland—splendid, glorious old Maryland—out in the country the housewife is sitting upon the veranda with a little sewing basket on a little table in front of her, with several pairs of scissors and needles and thread; and everything that she uses has a tax on it now, put there by the bill voted for by the Senator from Maryland. When she takes up the little buttonhole scissors, there is a tax upon them; when she takes up the scissors of a still larger size, there is a tax upon them; and when she takes up the largest scissors of all, there is a tax on them. So the needles and the thread and the scissors of the housewife bear taxes now by reason of the bill voted for by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. President, that is not all. The pipes that carry water to us are taxed. They have got the sand right at the seashore, and the next thing is the water. They have taxed the sand that makes up the shore and holds the water to its course. The closest they could get to taxing water was to tax the pipes that convey it to us. So the Republican Party has put a tax on everything that is of use and benefit to the American people. You would certainly think they would stop there, but they did not do it.

Mr. President, the bill for which the Senator voted puts a tax upon table salt and the salt that goes into your bread—salt at breakfast, salt at lunch, salt for dinner, salt for everything—and the Senator from Maryland, who has just received his nomination, hoarse now, fresh from the conflict, going into the general election which is soon to be, must go out before the people of Maryland and tell them what a glorious thing it is to have the proud privilege of paying a tax on salt! [Laughter.]

Mr. President, but few men can achieve these things in a lifetime—the glorious privilege of having it written opposite your name that "you succeeded in putting a tax upon salt"—salt, that saves fresh meat; salt, that seasons and cures it; salt, so useful to the human race that the Master Himself when he walked the dusty highways of Judea spoke about salt having lost its savor.

But, Mr. President, nobody ever dreamed that salt in the United States would ever lose its place on the free list of the every-day necessities of life. But the Senator from Maryland has voted to take it from the free list and put it on the tax list. The Salt Trust triumphed, and the people must pay the tax.

Mr. President, it must be great for a man who really loves the people to lie down at night and as he rests his head upon his pillow think how he helped to put a tax on brick, that are used to build houses to take care of people and shelter them from the storm; brick to build chimneys with fireplaces to keep them warm in winter; brick a common necessity of life. What an achievement for a Senator to have to his credit when he has helped to lay a tax upon the common necessities of life! How great the pleasure, Mr. President, for a Republican Senator as he drives along a road and sees a little bridge spanning a branch or a creek, or one still bigger spanning a river, as he drives across it in his limousine to think that he has the proud distinction of making cement more costly to the common man by voting to put a tax upon it.

Oh, Mr. President, how great is the record of the Republican Senator and his party! Here they are hanging on to this Liberian loan with grim determination to pass it. It is hard to shake them loose from it. Five million dollars? Why, Senators, that is taking money out of the Treasury. That is taking money out of a Treasury that you say is not able to provide shelter for a soldier who offered his life for his country. That is taking money out of a Treasury that you say is hard pressed and ought not to be burdened; yet you are ready to run your arms in it and take out $5,000,000, and three and a half million dollars or more of it will go right into Wall Street.

Oh, Senators, how long, how long will it be before the American people wake up to the necessity of sending more people here who will guard the Treasury instead of looting it? They call some of them "watchdogs of the Treasury." Mr. President, some of these old dogs have watched so long that they have gotten so they can sleep with one eye open. They can just hold one eye open and shut the other one, and the fellow who is an expert walks up on the blind side, and they never hear him until he is gone. Guarding the Treasury! One hundred thousand dollars, Senators, to bring about an inspection force that will pass upon the ability of trains to carry human beings from place to place in this country. No; you can not get that. One hundred thousand dollars, Senators, to provide competent, honorable men to go and look at these engines, to look at these cars, and say whether or not they are able to make these trips from town to town through the country.

"Why do you want that?" "Why, we want it because it is in the interest of human life. It is making travel safe. It is not permitting people to be reckless and careless about human life, but it is throwing every precaution and safeguard around people who travel." Who is it that is fighting that? What is it that does not want this extra force? It does not cost much. Why, $100,000 is not so very much when you compare it with $5,000,000, as I have said, and that is to be distributed through an agency that will bless and benefit everybody in the country; yet you are trying to get through a $5,000,000 proposition here that will not benefit anybody, but will merely pay off a debt that certain officeholders and certain people down in Liberia have contracted with certain people in New York City. That is the whole sum and substance of it, and Senators are seriously talking about voting for it, and yet we can not get through here an amendment for $100,000 to inspect the railroad trains of the country that transport from place to place human beings made in God's image. Mr. President, that is a terrible situation when you stop to analyze it.

Then the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] suggests that now is a good time to look after the reclamation projects, and the Senators on the other side will not permit that. "This is not the place," they say. Well, certainly we owe more to these people on the arid lands of the West who, when the tocsin of war sounded, sent forth their boys, pronounced their blessings upon them, bade them good-by, and saw some of them no more. They will never see them again. When these people belonging to the great body politic of America, these men who answered every call to patriotic duty, ask now that they be permitted to borrow $20,000,000 to help them make a livelihood for themselves and their families, Senators on the other side block it and threaten to defeat it. They are not for it. But one-fourth of that amount is all cut and dried, if they can have their way about it, to put upon a silver waiter and pass it on to those who are back of this bill, fighting for it with all the influences they can bring to bear.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas desires to have an executive session, I am willing to yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. CURTIS. It is the desire to have an executive session, and I understand the Senator from South Dakota wants to ask for the adoption of a conference report. So I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CANCELLATION OF INTERNATIONAL DEBTS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, on yesterday there was printed in the RECORD a letter addressed to Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH, signed by Bernard M. Baruch, with regard to the indebtedness due to the United States by the allied nations.

The letter of Mr. Baruch has the effect apparently of opening up an argument on the matter of the relinquishment of part or all of the indebtedness due by the allied governments to the United States. I am opposed to opening up any such debate, and I want to enter my protest against it. The allied nations entered into their obligations with the United States and those obligations were reduced to writing. They are practically the bonds of the allied nations. They are abundantly able to pay what they owe the United States.

Europe is not bankrupt. The governments of Europe have been poorly conducted financially, but the people of Europe still own all the values in Europe. Their fields are as fertile as they ever were. Their vineyards and their orchards are the same. Their water power and their transportation facilities, built up by generation after generation, remain. Their forests and their mines are unchanged, their productive power is greater than ever, and there is no reason why the American people should be taxed or that the wealth of America should be taxed in order to turn over the proceeds to the wealth of Europe the amount taken from the American people by taxation, and thus relieve the wealth of Europe from taxation. I am opposed to opening up that question for debate. It is not debatable.

America set a good example by refusing to take any indemnity from the Teutonic allies. She has as much right, morally and legally, to reimbursement as any nation who suffered loss. America expended over $40,000,000,000 in saving Europe from the destruction of democracy by European military autocracy. She has done enough. The destruction of the ruble, the mark, the kronen by the stupid or sinister use of the printing press does not change the actual wealth or productive power of Europe. International bankers know how to profit out of the propaganda to have the United States cancel the debt due America by Europe, but the American people will never permit it.

BOLSHEVISM.

Mr. President, I am unwilling to add a dollar to the taxes of our people, especially for such a purpose.

It is the tremendous taxation of our people which has caused the recent deep discontent of the country, led to high prices of manufactured commodities, to labor strikes, to general unrest, and the fear of timid people of socialism, communism, and bolshevism. I have no fear of communism or bolshevism in America. They can only flourish where the people are very poor, very unhappy, and very uneducated, as in Russia, but not in our glorious country.

There is no danger of bolshevism or communism in America, for these policies are based on ignorance—lack of education and information. In spite of every criticism of our Government it is more nearly perfect than any government in the world. Our people are the most intelligent in the world. We have the greatest public school and educational system in the world. We have the most splendid and useful public press, the finest and most numerous magazines, the best public forum, and the best means of educating, training, and advising our citizens of any country in the world. We have, beside, 20,000 moving-picture theaters entertaining, amusing, and instructing our people daily. Recently these theater owners, with great magnanimity and patriotism, have opened their doors free on one day each week for the youth of the country to see free films on vocational instruction.

Over 60,000,000 feet of instructional films are being distributed free to the people of the United States by one institution in Washington City (Bureau of Commercial Economics) without cost to the people. They are circulating vocational instruction reels teaching the people and the American youth how to make every manufactured product on earth from steam engines to cambric needles; plumbing, carpentry, brick laying, painting, masonry, textile manufacture, gardening, raising fruit, berries, bees, poultry, cattle, pigs, and horses.

These productive films are in a constant stream reaching every part of America teaching the most unenlightened citizen how to make his living; teaching him lessons of providence, of cooperation, of patriotism, of the rights of property and the wisdom of protecting property rights; teaching him brotherly good will and entertaining him by pictures showing every activity and amusement of mankind. In every human heart there is a love of truth, of liberty, of justice; a natural desire to acquire and protect property rights; and when men can make a decent living by reasonable effort, as all can do in America, those who teach bolshevism, hatred, and disorder, and those who by thoughtless waste and extravagance excite the envy of the very poor, will themselves be taught the better path by these great forces to which I have so inadequately referred. There is no danger of communism or bolshevism in America. The moving pictures alone would make it impossible. We should encourage in every way possible this the greatest agency of human education ever conceived by man. Moving pictures speak a universal language and the impressions through the eye have been proven to be over four times as powerful and enduring as the impression through the ear by the spoken word. Both the States and the Nation should multiply the vocational reels and give them free circulation as a means of multiplying the productive powers of the people. It would be the most valuable investment ever made by a government.

(Ltd.).

I recommend that, in order to effect a settlement of these claims in accordance with the recommendation of the Acting Secretary of State, the Congress, as an act of grace, and without reference to the legal liability of the United States in the premises, authorize an appropriation in the sum of $45,518.59.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, September 14, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou gracious God, infinite and full of blessing, Thou hast led us and made Thy truth and mercy known in fatherly benediction. Thy hand has been upon us and we give Thee thanks. Teach us that the richest treasures of life are invisible and Thy supreme revelation is to the human heart. Persuade us that each day there remains some sign of duty which is a testimony of Thy wisdom. O spare us from that pride which is the root of every sin and endow us with that humility which is the beginning of every virtue. Rebuke all unrighteous conflict throughout our country, and reproach all selfishness and make all citizens willing offerings of their fellowmen. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, by unanimous consent (at the request of Mr. WINGO), was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of illness.

MUSCLE SHOALS.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for half a minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for half a minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, as acting chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, there has been placed in my hands a petition, signed by some 220,000 citizens of the Southern States and border States, praying for action on the Muscle Shoals proposition, and asking that Congress take the matter up. I ask unanimous consent that the prayer of the petitioners, which is very short, be inserted in the RECORD—not the names.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Following is the petition referred to:

To the Congress of the United States:

We, the undersigned, respectfully urge the acceptance of the Ford offer for the Muscle Shoals Government plant. Farmers, wage earners, and business men of moderate means are, we feel, united in their support of the Ford offer. Their faith in Mr. Ford is based not only on his business success but on the further fact that he has never combined with other interests to fix or maintain high prices for his products, but has been willing to enter an open field on a real competitive basis.

We respectfully ask that in view of what the operation of the nitrate plant will mean to the farmers of America, and the construction of the dam and plant will mean to thousands of wage earners, that Congress fix an early day for the consideration of the bill now pending in Congress from the Military Affairs Committee, and that final action be hastened thereon.

LIZZIE ASKELI.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 3034, and move that the House disagree to the Senate amendment and ask for a conference thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 3034, and moves that the House disagree to the Senate amendment and ask for a conference thereon. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3034) for the relief of Lizzie Askeli.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, what is the issue involved?

Mr. EDMONDS. The Senate reduced the amount from $5,000 to $2,500.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not accept the Senate amendment?

Mr. EDMONDS. The House may not want to accept it, and I ask that we have a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. EDMONDS, Mr. GLYNN, and Mr. STEAGALL.

MICHIGAN BOULEVARD BUILDING CO.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 5918, and move that the House disagree to the Senate amendment and ask for a conference thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 5918, and moves to disagree to the Senate amendment and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5918) for the relief of the Michigan Boulevard Building Co.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. EDMONDS, Mr. GLYNN, and Mr. STEAGALL.

SETTLEMET OF CERTAIN DEPARTMENT CLAIMS.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent also to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 7912, and move that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table also the bill H. R. 7912, and moves that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference thereon. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7912) to provide a method for the settlement of claims arising against the Government of the United States in sums not exceeding $1,000 in any one case.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the dispute between the two Houses?

Mr. EDMONDS. The Senate advanced the amount. The amount which the House agreed upon is $1,000. The Senate advanced it to $3,000. This is a bill for the settlement of admiralty cases in the Navy, collision cases. A Senate amendment also made the bill retroactive.

Mr. WINGO. We have a statute on certain classes of claims. Will the gentleman recall what that is?

Mr. EDMONDS. I believe the limit is $500. This raises it.

Mr. WINGO. The Senate made it $3,000?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes. There may be some good reason for making it $3,000, but we would like to have the Senate's reasons for it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. EDMONDS, Mr. GLYNN, and Mr. STEAGALL.

W. W. M'GRATH.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent also to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 2722, and move that the House disagree to the Senate amendment and ask for a conference thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the same request with respect to this bill. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2722) for the relief of W. W. McGrath.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what is the issue in that case?

Mr. EDMONDS. The Senate reduced the House amount.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is just a question of amount?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; it is just a question of amount; that is all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. EDMONDS, Mr. GLYNN, and Mr. STEAGALL.

CLAIMS ARISING FROM NAVAL COLLISIONS.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent also to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 5349, and move that the House disagree to the Senate amendment and ask for a conference thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the same request in respect to this bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5349) to amend the act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to settle claims for damages to private property arising from collisions with naval vessels.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, this is the admiralty case. The other was the limitation of claims to $1,000 in the departments. In both cases the Senate made it retroactive.

Mr. WINGO. That is the point I wanted to get at. I was under the impression that we had a statute making a $500 limitation with reference to only one department, and the House bill, as I recall, made it apply to all the executive departments and put the limitation up to $1,000.

Mr. EDMONDS. That was the bill the gentleman was speaking of. I made a mistake as to the identity of the bill.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand, the bill I was speaking about authorized the different executive departments to settle claims up to $1,000?

Mr. EDMONDS. That is right.

Mr. WINGO. That was the House proposition?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The only change the Senate made was to raise it to $3,000?

Mr. EDMONDS. They also made it retroactive and included the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps.

Mr. WINGO. In other words, their amendment would make a general statute applying to all the departments.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Whereas we kept them separate.

Mr. EDMONDS. No; we covered all the civil departments, but kept out the military departments. They have included the military departments.

Mr. WINGO. We made a separation between the civil departments and the military departments.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is right.

Mr. WINGO. The Senate not only made it retroactive but joined the civil and the military establishments in one law.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. And that is what is in dispute, and you want that to go to conference?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; and in this Navy bill they made the amount $3,000, as I explained before.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. EDMONDS, Mr. GLYNN, and Mr. STEAGALL.

KINEO TRUST CO.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 8073, for the relief of the Kineo Trust Co., and move that the House agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up a House bill with Senate amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. EDMONDS. In this case, Mr. Speaker, there was evidently a mistake in the date. We had the date in the bill March, and the department asked that it be changed to September. Otherwise the bill is the same as it passed the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What is the significance of the date?

Mr. EDMONDS. The bonds for which these people were to be reimbursed on putting up proper security matured in September, not in March.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let us have the Senate amendment read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 13, strike out the word "March" and insert "September."

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I do not recall that case. What is it?

Mr. EDMONDS. It was a case where the Kineo Trust Co. lost the bonds. They have the numbers of the bonds. There is no objection on the part of the department as long as they put up a deposit sufficient to secure the Government. It appears that the maturity date of the bonds was September instead of March.

Mr. WINGO. The effect of the bill is to reimburse the company for the loss of the bonds, they indemnifying the Government against the bonds showing up?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The only change made by the Senate is in the date of the bonds. It does not affect the merits of the controversy?

Mr. EDMONDS. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

HORACE E. WALKER.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table House bill 6929, for the relief of Horace E. Walker, and to agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks to take from the Speaker's table the House bill, with Senate amendment, to be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

MRS. E. H. JACKSON.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table House bill 8173, for the relief of Mrs. E. H. Jackson, and move that the House agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up a House bill, with a Senate amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL CLERICAL SERVICE IN ENROLLING ROOM.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration of the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up from the Committee on Accounts a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 426 (Rept. No. 1215).

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the sum of $250 for additional clerical service in the enrolling room during the remainder of the present session.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this is the usual resolution at the end of the session for the employment of additional clerical help in the enrolling room.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

FEMALE ATTENDANTS IN LADIES' RETIRING ROOMS.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I call up the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 413 (Rept. No. 1216).

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided by law, compensation at the rate of $100 per month to each of the female attendants in the ladies' retiring rooms of the House of Representatives, in lieu of the salary now being paid such attendants.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this is a long-overdue resolution that simply equalizes the salaries of the lady employees in the ladies' retiring rooms of the House wing of the Capitol.

Mr. STAFFORD. What salary are they now receiving?

Mr. IRELAND. One is receiving the amount mentioned in the resolution and the others are receiving about $60, I believe.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does this cover the House Office Building?

Mr. IRELAND. No; only the Capitol Building.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for an amendment?

Mr. IRELAND. I would rather not, if the gentleman will indulge me in that; but if the gentleman will introduce a resolution covering the similar employees in the House Office Building, we will take it up in the committee. I think they should be paid the same amount.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think the salary of the attendants in the ladies' retiring room in the House Office Building should be increased.

Mr. HICKS. How much is it?

Mr. IRELAND. I think it is about $60 a month. I think we had best take it up in the regular way, but if the gentleman will introduce a resolution we will consider it at once. Certainly there should be equality in the compensation of all the employees employed in the same capacity.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

NORMAN E. IVES.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask for consideration of the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 416 (Rept. No. 1217).

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House $1,200 to Norman E. Ives for extra and expert services to the Committee on Invalid Pensions from December 4, 1921, to the end of the second session of the Sixty-seventh Congress as assistant clerk to said committee by detail from the Bureau of Pensions pursuant to law.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this is the usual resolution for additional compensation to the appointee to the Committee on Invalid Pensions assigned from the Pension Department. This takes care of the employee up to the 1st of December.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the purpose that this gentleman should receive additional salary for his services following December 1 until the end of the Congress?

Mr. IRELAND. I can not definitely recall now just what the precedent is, but the same form will be followed each year.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I recall we formerly granted the additional compensation to only one of the men assigned from the Pension Office to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Later that was extended to the employees of the Bureau of Pensions assigned to the Committee on Pensions. How many are receiving this additional emolument?

Mr. IRELAND. One to each committee. That has been the custom. There was an unauthorized error prior to the present personnel of the Committee on Accounts under which two employees were paid.

Mr. STAFFORD. The rule of the committee is to give this additional emolument to only one employee for each committee?

Mr. IRELAND. Only one for each committee, and that is all there is contemplated now.

Mr. STAFFORD. And $1,200 additional for each year of service.

Mr. IRELAND. It is supposed to be on the basis of $100 a month; yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair inadvertently referred S. 3275, a pension bill, to the Committee on Pensions instead of to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, where it belongs. If there be no objection the Chair will rerefer the bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ARTHUR LUCAS.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I call up the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 424 (Rept. No. 1218).

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, $100 to Arthur Lucas for special janitor services rendered during the second session of the Sixty-seventh Congress.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this resolution covers janitor service rendered to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in his office for the period of 10 or 12 months.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

SESSION TELEPHONE OPERATORS.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up from the Committee on Accounts the following privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 428 (Rept. No. 1219).

Resolved, That the employment of three session telephone operators shall be continued during the months of October and November, 1922, at the compensation now provided by law to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this is necessary to provide compensation for the operators during the interim when Congress may not be in session.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. IRELAND. I have a letter from the Clerk requesting the passage of this resolution.

HARRY J. HUNT.

Mr. IRELAND. I have another resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up from the Committee on Accounts the following privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 361 (Rept. No. 1220).

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to Harry J. Hunt, assistant file clerk of the House, the sum of $300 for additional services rendered under the direction of the Clerk of the House during the present fiscal year.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this is additional compensation for the employee who rendered five months' extra service while another employee of the House was in the hospital. He did double work, and at the request and recommendation of the Clerk of the House this resolution is reported.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Have we ever indulged heretofore in the practice of paying House employees additional salaries for having done extra work?

Mr. IRELAND. Oh, innumerable times, I think. The situation was that one of the House employees assigned to one of the committees was in the hospital for about five months. This employee mentioned in this resolution did his own work and did the other man's work in addition, working nights and at odd times, mostly at night.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman says "innumerable times." I confess I do not recollect any resolution of that kind when such a practice has been indulged in.

Mr. IRELAND. There have been many where additional compensation was granted to clerks assigned to different committees when they were drawing appropriation bills. I recall one in the Sixty-sixth Congress in the Naval Affairs Committee, and a number of other cases.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not recall an instance where a Government employee of the House was given additional compensation merely for doing some little extra work to aid some person who was ill. If we adopt that policy we will be beset with innumerable applications for increased compensation.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman will yield, I remember the additional compensation to the clerk for work on the big naval bill in the Sixty-sixth Congress.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement of Comptroller Crissinger relative to financial help given to certain countries in Europe during the last eight years, and the sources from which such help was derived.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. D. R. CRISSINGER, COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY, BEFORE THE INDIANA BANKERS' ASSOCIATION, INDIANAPOLIS, IND., WEDNESDAY SEPTEMBER 13, 1922.

Mr. President and gentlemen of the convention, when, several weeks ago, I received an invitation to address this convention I hesitated to accept because I did not want to address a middle-western audience on the economic and financial situation until I could give assurance of my conviction that affairs were definitely moving in the right direction. In reaching a determination on such a matter I felt compelled to weigh and consider the facts concerning the industrial and general economic situation in the United States and in the world, particularly Europe.

I think we are all able substantially to agree, nowadays, that the economic and industrial world must be treated as substantially a unity. It will not very long prosper in some parts unless it prospers in all parts. I quite recognize that this has been said a great many times before, and by men much wiser than myself; but I doubt if anybody has said it with more earnestness and sincerity than I do.

From where I sit in Washington I have for many months been watching the tendencies of political, industrial, and financial concerns in those parts of the world which most affect our own country. As an observer from the watchtower, I have had experiences which I know will appeal to you gentlemen.

I have noted by the morning paper that the situation in Ireland was being rapidly composed, and that with this situation adjusted western Europe would be in sight of peace and normal activities. Then, in the evening paper of the same day, I have read that all hope of Irish composition was ended, that chaos had supervened, and that with Ireland in such a situation there was no hope for western Europe.

Again, I have read in my morning paper that the Washington Conference on Limitation of Armament had brought about an understanding between Japan, America, Britain, and France that insured the peace of the Pacific, which peace was assured of rapidly spreading to other seas and continents, so that no longer need we fear hostilities. Then, turning to my evening paper of the same day, I have been informed, "on the highest authority," that the stress in relations between the United States and the Far East made all hope of peace impossible for a generation or two.

Time and again Monday's newspaper has brought assurance that the coalition Government in Great Britain was about to be overthrown and succeeded by a return of party administration, which would bring us back to safety and sanity; and then, on Tuesday, I have read that the coalition Government was certain to continue for another year, and that therefore the world might feel reasonably assured that it was safe and on the upward path.

I have read one day that the policy of Britain was to break from the old entente with France and to cement a definite understanding with Germany, and the next day I have been assured, in most positive terms, that whatever else might happen the entente between Britain and France was as solid as Gibraltar. I have learned one day that the United States must take its full and proper part in settling the affairs of the Old World, and the next day I have been assured that the United States was going to do nothing of the sort, because that would be precisely the wrong thing to do.

All these things and a thousand more of the same sort have come to the attention of every man here, and every one of you has long since concluded, as I have, that it is rather useless to steer a course in conformity to the prognostications of those who deal merely in the terms of politics and diplomatic relations.

So I have long ago laid aside all considerations of such forecasts and attempted to devise a chart of my own by which one might with reasonable confidence steer a course amid the rocks and whirlpools, the currents and the typhoons, of these difficult times, with reasonable hope of bringing his ship into a safe anchorage. And, indulging neither that confidence which the politician in office always entertains, nor that pessimism by which the politician out of office is equally certain to be guided, I have found it worth while to consider certain definite and substantial evidences of what is actually going on in the world.

So to-day I want to talk a little about some things that we know are actually happening; about conditions that unquestionably obtain; about the crises that have been passed without disaster, and the reasons for belief that as other crises arise they likewise will be passed over without ultimate wreck.

It is become a truism that unless the United States "comes to the rescue of Europe," Europe can not survive. Some people who employ this phrase seem to have in mind that we must rush over to Europe with a treasure chest full of gold and credit evidences, and by rubbing the two together produce an Aladdinlike effect of universal prosperity, wealth, and satisfaction. Others have apparently entertained the view that what we needed to do was to send commercial agents abroad to gather in the gold and securities, the profits and fee titles of about all the rest of the world and bring them back for our own strong boxes. I may say frankly that neither of these programs has ever particularly appealed to me. I have always had doubts whether the loan of our gold and credits to a Europe unprepared for proper employment of them would be of advantage either to Europe or to us; and I have had misgivings, on the other side, whether either we or the Old World would profit much by an undue eagerness on our part to reap quick profits from the unfortunate situation of the older hemisphere.

And so, like most of you, gentlemen, I have been slow to make up my mind what was our duty to others or our obligation to ourselves. I have rather suspected that if we did not attempt to decide too many of our problems too suddenly, a good many of them would decide themselves. I remember an observation of Mr. Carnegie many years ago, that most of the letters that were ever written, if they were left unanswered for a fortnight, would not require answers. I don't want too literally to commend that policy for day-by-day business; but I am willing to say that as to these broad questions about which none of us is very certain, Mr. Carnegie demonstrated a good deal of wisdom. There is no use making up your mind, firmly and irrevocably, about things concerning which you have no information. There is no use deciding exactly what you were going to do when you don't know what to decide. There is no use determining the policy you will adopt in a set of circumstances that as a matter of fact are never going to arise. It is a good deal better to take your time, to know the elements you are dealing with, to be assured what you were talking about before you fix a policy and declare it.

I am making these suggestions because they seem pertinent to developments of the last two or three years in this country and this world. I would hesitate even to estimate the number of crises we have confronted in the last 20 months. The only thing I am sure of is that we have come to entertain grave doubts about the gravity of crises and a much better grounded confidence that regardless of crises things were going to move along pretty much as they would have moved if the crises had not supervened. Sometimes I get to suspecting that we have all been shell shocked into a general preference for crises and a feeling that unless "collapse" or "disintegration" is promised to us in the latest bulletin from the front the day is rather tame and uneventful. We need to discuss matters of this kind in terms a little less lurid, a trifle less conclusive, to realize that the world isn't coming to an end within an hour or a day, to recognize that no matter how acute the crises most of us will be left right here, doing business at the same old stand, living on the same old farm, going down to the same old office, living with the same wives and the same children as before the crises arrived.

The truth is that if we could look back on the Great War and its aftermath from the viewpoint of, say, 500 years hence we might discover that the crises was passed 5 years ago, and, on the other hand, we might discover that it did not come to the world until 50 years hence. We greatly need to begin thinking in terms that will leave our "crises" and "collapses" and "wrecks" and "repudiations" and to get back to thinking about tilling fields and operating industries and conducting transportation for the general good of the community.

There has been a good deal of demand that the United States recognize its obligation to the world and begin to perform that obligation. Very well, gentlemen; I propose to tell you something of what the United States has done by way of recognizing its duty and performing its obligation. We have been told that the United States was the great reservoir of liquid credit and available assets from which we must permit drafts to be made if the world is to be placed on its feet. I have myself said these things. I began saying them even before our country declared its participation in the European war. I said them before we had begun to advance moneys and credits to our allies. I kept right on saying them during the period when the gold of the world was flowing ceaselessly to our shores, denuding other communities of their basic money and inviting us to a carnival of gilded inflation, to be followed, as any man must know it would be followed, by a debacle of ruinous deflation.

Back three generations ago the world's pioneers and adventurers and financiers and business men discovered the possibilities of the American Continent. They discovered that here was a tremendous storehouse of God's wealth, under the control of a sparse population of intelligent and progressive people. They recognized our right of political control, but they recognized also our economic needs, our necessities of development, our financial requirements. And so the Old World loaned money to us, with which we built our railroads, opened our mines, made ourselves the greatest producer of foodstuffs, of copper, of coal, of iron, of gold, of cotton, of a hundred great staples out of which our mechanized civilization has been built. The old World came to us with its money and credit and said: "We have the capital; you have the God-given resources; give us an investment for our surplus and capital in your national opportunities and we will make possible the development of those opportunities."

On those terms we got together. The Old World largely financed the development of the New World during the nineteenth century. We developed a wealth, a producing capacity, a variety of resource, that we did not fully recognize. We swung out into the twentieth century still innocent of how much we had accomplished, still imagining that while we had done very well we could not, of course, assume to compete with the older industries, the established finance, the highly organized enterprise of the Old World.

And then came the Great War. It dazed us at first, then it brought us a realization of our fortune. We discovered overnight our giant capacity to produce, to supply the needs of men everywhere, to hold up the arch and pillars of a democratic civilization. That we did; and the discovery that we were able to do it was a greater revelation to us than to our allies. We had never suspected such a capacity, such wealth, such resources of productiveness, such unity of social purpose, such determination to align ourselves on the side of justice. But we found them when the world came to us with its demands, and though there may be here and elsewhere those who would cry down, who would decline to recognize our contribution, the fact remains that our contribution of nature's wealth, of human effort, of spiritual understanding and determination, was second to that of no other people on earth.

Now, let us see what America has done, whether America has been doing all it should in the four years since the armistice. Let us consider calmly and fairly whether we have been doing about the right thing or whether we have overlooked our duty. We loaned some $10,000,000,000 to our allies, which, principal and interest, now amounts to some $12,000,000,000. We incurred a national debt of some $20,000,000,000. We raised an army of more than 4,000,000 and we sent more than 2,000,000 of armed men across the seas. I do not propose to discuss their contribution to military results; I leave that to others more capable. I propose to confine myself to the mere economics of this situation, for this situation in the world to-day is decidedly an economic and a social one with which we must cope.

A year ago, two years ago, we were all agreed that the gold standard could not be maintained in the world if all the gold were to come to America. From 1915 on it had been persistently flowing to us from every land and every quarter. At first we had received it with satisfaction and gratification as evidence of our increasing wealth and abounding prosperity. There came a time when we realized that if too much of it came to us, if the gold standard were to be broken down in the world, the gold itself would be of mighty little value to us. We began to be told that we must take credits, securities, bonds, stocks, rather than gold, and before long we realized that this was true. We began first to take the bonds of the allied nations, then to buy the securities that stood for their industries and enterprises, which came seeking from us that same financial support which the Old World had given to us in our nineteenth century epoch of rapid development.

I read the other day that thus far this year the sales of foreign securities in the United States had averaged something like $20,000,000 every week. I don't know how accurate the figures are, for I have no better access to the details than the rest of you have. I do know that day by day, week by week, month by month, we have all seen the financial advertising through which American investors have been offered the securities of almost all the countries under the sun. Only the other day $185,000,000 of bonds of the Republic of Argentina were authorized to be sold in this country. We have taken the securities of the city of Rio de Janeiro and the Republic of Brazil; we have bought the securities of the East Indian Co. of Holland, of the Royal Dutch Oil Corporation, of the cities of France, the Government of China, the Governments, the Provinces, the peoples, the incorporated companies of the whole world. On top of our loans during the period of the war we have acquired other billions upon billions of corporate and private and back credits, until we have become the greatest creditor community that the world ever saw.

Are we doing our share toward the rehabilitation of the world? I undertake to say that when American investors buy $200,000,000 of South American Government securities—of securities which 10 years ago would have been placed in Europe—we are literally and actually releasing that amount of credit and financial resource to serve the immediate needs of Europe. Europe in the last seven years, by way of financing itself, has been selling off its holdings of securities throughout the world. We have been taking them; and to that extent have been lifting from Europe the burden of financing the world, freeing the energies and capital of Europe to look after its own concerns.

I am going to attempt summarizing briefly the American contribution to support the world's financial structure in the last few years. I will begin with 1914, when, according to the best estimates, foreign investors owned from four billion to five billion dollars of American securities. Since the beginning of the war we have, first, bought back by far the greater part of those securities, probably two-thirds of them. Then, following our direct participation in the war, we loaned $10,000,000,000 to our European allies, which, with accrued interest, amounts to roundly $12,000,000,000.

But this is not all. We have extended commercial credits to European buyers in our markets to an amount variously estimated from two billion to five billion dollars. Still further, we have been buying the securities of foreign countries ever since the armistice. A highly reliable authority assures me that these purchases have amounted to:

For the year 1919	$713,610,633
For the year 1920	571,700,282
For the year 1921	596,454,040
For the year 1922 (Jan. 1 to Sept. 5)	751,386,725

If the same rate should be continued for the remainder of this year we will have purchased during 1922 about $1,100,000,000 of foreign securities, and for the four years, 1919, 1920, 1921, and 1922, about $2,500,000,000 of foreign securities.

But these foreign securities to which I am referring include only those issued in terms of American dollars, for flotation here. In addition, our people have been large purchasers of securities issued abroad in terms of the money of the country of issue. I am informed that for 1919, 1920, and 1921 we bought over $620,000,000 of such securities. So it appears that for the four years our purchases of foreign securities, whether expressed in dollars or in the units of foreign currency, will far exceed $3,000,000,000.

But this still does not represent by any means our total financial contribution. American optimism was never better demonstrated than when, early in 1919, Americans began to buy German marks, Italian lira, French francs, and other foreign moneys. I have been unable to approximate satisfactorily the amount of speculation in foreign money that has been carried on. A good European authority recently indicated that probably about 15,000,000,000 German marks had been sold outside Germany at prices ranging all the way from about 7 cents down to the near vanishing point which the mark recently reached. If it be true that Germany has sold 15,000,000,000 marks outside of Germany, and that they have sold at an average of 5 cents to the mark, as some authorities have declared, that would mean that Germany has exported $750,000,000 worth of marks, which are now held abroad, and in exchange for which Germany has established credits with which to buy raw materials, foodstuffs and the like. What proportion of that $750,000,000 has been taken in America one can only conjecture. But, judging by observation and general information, I think it fair to assume that at least a half billion dollars of good American gold-standard money has been invested in the moneys of foreign countries. That likewise must be added to the total of what we have been contributing toward the financial rehabilitation of the Old World; in the case of the mark, our investment begins to take on the general aspect of a deed of gift; it could hardly have been more completely a donation if we have turned the money into bales of cotton, pigs of copper, bushels of wheat, and shipped it as a free gift to Germany.

The point I am making is that whether we have received securities on which the interest is reasonably certain to be paid, or other securities on which it has not been and may never be paid, or currency whose value has faded away to nothingness; whether we have received or have failed to receive real value, it is still true that we have exported this vast amount of wealth. Let me recapitulate. As I have calculated it, our contributions to financing the outside world since August, 1914, may be summarized as follows:

American securities repurchased from abroad	$3,000,000,000
American Government loans	10,000,000,000
Interest on Government loans	2,000,000,000
Commercial credits extended abroad	3,000,000,000
Dollar securities bought from foreign countries:
1919	713,000,000
1920	571,000,000
1921	596,000,000
1922 (eight months)	751,000,000
Foreign money securities sold here 1919, 1920, 1921, and 1922	620,000,000
Foreign currencies bought by America	500,000,000
Total	21,751,000,000

I feel that the present is a not inappropriate time to refer to this truly gigantic participation by our country in sustaining and stabilizing the finances of the world. There are some people in the United States who persist that our country has not done, and is not doing, its full part, and that the world can not possibly be restored and replaced on the way to prosperity and order without American assistance. My reply to this is, broadly, that in the last eight years our country has made a contribution to these ends so great that if we ourselves fully appreciated it, and if we were given fair credit for it by other peoples, it would win us the bright guerdon of helpfulness, of willing cooperation, and of splendid unselfishness.

What, then, has been the effect of all this upon Europe? We hear much about the demoralization of currencies there. We hear about the failure of European Governments to balance their budgets, to make their taxes pay their current expenses and the service of their debts. What is the truth? So nearly as I am able to determine, the year 1921 marked a very great and striking advance over the year 1920 in the matter of balancing governmental budgets. I find substantial testimony that the world has been progressing quite satisfactorily toward paying its governmental way. I find that the year 1921 marked a decided improvement in the matter of budgets in this regard, and that 1922 is continuing the improvement. I do not intend to annoy you with figures and details, but, in general, I am informed and believe that western Europe has been making marked reduction of governmental expenses toward the point where current taxation would care for them. I think that if you will compare the detailed financial experience of these countries for the years immediately following the World War with the records of their experience in the years immediately following the Napoleonic struggle you will be convinced, as I have been, that the twentieth century world is handling its problems of finance and economics far more satisfactorily than did the nineteenth century world.

Let me go a step further by way of suggesting the progress toward normal conditions. The French Republic is Europe's political center of gravity. France has made persistent, steady, and remarkable progress toward reestablishing a proper relationship of income to outgo in Government finance. We may fairly assure ourselves that France has passed its economic point of crisis. The fiscal year 1923 is not unlikely to see the French budget balanced, and we may hope that 1924 will see a balance well established. The note issues of the Bank of France show a tendency downward which indicates that deflation is moving safely toward reestablishing relations between the French monetary system and the gold standard.

Italian Government finances are making favorable progress, and Italian money is likewise strengthening its position. There is not much to be said about the situation in Britain, because Britain is showing the regular British disposition to maintain its high standards, to continue its leadership in good banking, sound finance, and solid business.

If you will turn to Switzerland, you will find a country whose greatest misfortune in recent times has been that its money has been too good; the exchange rate has been so strongly in its favor as to impose actual difficulties in business transactions. Much the same is true of Holland and the Scandinavian States.

When we go beyond Europe to the outlying countries of the world we find that on the whole they have been able to raise capital to start toward reestablishing their industries, to inaugurate better budgets, to resume production, and to start their monetary systems toward rehabilitation.

While we have talked about the importance of the world resuming production, the world has been resuming. Two years ago there were broad intimations that Latin America confronted a difficult situation, perhaps an economic crisis. That danger is passed or passing. In a broad fashion, I undertake to say that there is no English-speaking country or dominion or colony, no nation or State based on the Latin culture and ideals, that has not vastly improved its status in the two years last past. Japan has passed the peak of economic tribulations which began with the depression of the silk industry. The tendency everywhere is toward reducing the burdens of armaments and the dangers of war, thanks in part to the general good sense that men are displaying and thanks also to the constructive program put forward by the Washington Conference on the Limitation of Armament. The will to war, however we may construe the incidents of the day's news, is a less potent factor in the world than for a generation past. The will to peace is to-day's dominating purpose. The will to work, to produce, to restore, is testified everywhere from the Vistula and the Black Sea to the Atlantic and thence throughout the world.

These conditions, gentlemen, I am suggesting to you in order to draw attention to the fact that the world is on the upgrade. It has less of war, less of preparation for war, less of the wasteful fabrication of instruments for war, than at any time since the calamitous days of August, 1914. Not only has it produced good crops in this year 1922, but it has more nearly stabilized the means of exchanging and utilizing its production to meet the common requirements than ever before since the beginning of the World War.

These facts are attested by experience, the commercial reports, the crop statistics, the financial statements. We do not hear so much of them as I wish we might from certain politicians or from the prophets of disaster or from those pessimistic persons who have fallen into the habit of seeing nothing ahead except disaster and ruin. I am appealing to you, gentlemen, to give thought to these conditions, of which all of you are aware, and to give weight to them. There is every indication that within the coming year our own country will see a great revival of demand for all our industrial and agricultural staples. Everywhere that you find economic rather than political conditions dominating you will find improvement.

These are universally the signs of the times, and they compel us to conclude that this year, 1922, has seen the world set well in the way to sanity, to the desire and ability to take care of itself, to pay its debts, to restore its industries, its production, and its exchanges.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the British White Paper known as the Balfour note.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the Balfour note. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, is that on the question of the cancellation of war debts?

Mr. KING. It has reference to the war debts generally. It was issued by Lord Balfour and I think it will be highly illuminating to Members of the House.

Mr. WINGO. I am somewhat shocked that my friend should give credence to it by putting it in the RECORD.

Mr. KING. I will say that I am not in favor of it.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will it do away with a speech by the gentleman on it if it is put in the RECORD?

Mr. KING. Perhaps it might.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to is here printed in full as follows:

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, on August 1, 1922, an important note by the Earl of Balfour, acting minister for foreign affairs of Great Britain, on the subject of interallied indebtedness, was communicated to European allied nations.

Because of the great interest in the subject, I desire to submit the note herewith, as submitted to France, for the information of the Members of the House:

As Your Excellency is aware, the general question of the French debt to this country has not as yet been the subject of any formal communication between the two Governments, nor are his Majesty's Government anxious to raise it at the present moment. Recent events, however, leave them little choice in the matter, and they feel compelled to lay before the French Government their views on certain aspects of the situation created by the present condition of international indebtedness.

Speaking in general terms, the war debts, exclusive of interest, due to Great Britain at the present moment amount in the aggregate to about £3,400,000,000, of which Germany owes £1,450,000,000, Russia £650,000,000, and our allies £1,300,000,000. On the other hand, Great Britain owes the United States about a quarter of this sum—say, £850,000,000 at par of exchange, together with interest accrued since 1919.

No international discussion has yet taken place on the unexampled situation partially disclosed by these fiugres; and, pending a settlement which would go to the root of the problem, his Majesty's Government have silently abstained from making any demands upon their allies, either for the payment of interest or the repayment of capital. But, if action in the matter has hitherto been deemed inopportune, this is not because his Majesty's Government either underrate the evils of the present state of affairs, or because they are reluctant to make large sacrifices to bring it to an end. On the contrary, they are prepared, if such a policy formed part of a satisfactory international settlement, to remit all the debts due to Great Britain by our allies in respect of loans, or by Germany in respect of reparations.

Recent events, however, make such a policy difficult of accomplishment. With the most perfect courtesy and in the exercise of their undoubted rights, the American Government have required this country to pay the interest accrued since 1919 on the Anglo-American debt, to convert it from an unfunded to a funded debt, and to repay it by a sinking fund in 25 years. Such a procedure is clearly in accordance with the original contract. His Majesty's Government make no complaint of it; they recognize their obligations, and are prepared to fulfill them. But evidently they can not do so without profoundly modifying the course which, in different circumstances, they would have wished to pursue. They can not treat the repayment of the Anglo-American loan as if it were an isolated incident in which only the United States of America and Great Britain had any concern. It is but one of a connected series of transactions, in which this country appears sometimes as debtor, sometimes as creditor; and, if our undoubted obligations as a debtor are to be enforced, our not less undoubted rights as a creditor can not be left wholly in abeyance.

PURPOSE OF THE LOANS.

His Majesty's Government do not conceal the fact that they adopt this change of policy with the greatest reluctance. It is true that Great Britain is owed more than it owes, and that if all interallied war debts were paid the British treasury would, on balance, be a large gainer by the transaction. But can the present world situation be looked at only from this narrow financial standpoint? It is true that many of the allied and associated powers are, as between each other, creditors or debtors, or both. But they were and are much more. They were partners in the greatest international effort ever made in the cause of freedom; and they are still partners in dealing with some, at least, of its results. Their debts were incurred, their loans were made, not for the separate advantage of particular States but for a great purpose common to them all; and that purpose has been, in the main, accomplished.

To generous minds it can never be agreeable, although, for reasons of state, it may perhaps be necessary to regard the monetary aspect of this great event as a thing apart, to be torn from its historical setting and treated as no more than an ordinary commercial dealing between traders who borrow and capitalists who lend. There are, moreover, reasons of a different order, to which I have already referred, which increase the distaste with which his Majesty's Government adopts so fundamental an alteration in method of dealing with loans to allies. The economic ills from which the world is suffering are due to many causes, moral and material, which are quite outside the scope of this dispatch. But among them must certainly be reckoned the weight of international indebtedness, with all its unhappy effects upon credit and exchange, upon national production and international trade. The peoples of all countries long for a speedy return to the normal. But how can the normal be reached while conditions so abnormal are permitted to prevail? And how can these conditions be cured by any remedies that seem at present likely to be applied?

ONE-SIDED PROCEDURE IMPOSSIBLE.

For evidently the policy hitherto pursued by this country of refusing to make demands upon its debtors is only tolerable so long as it is generally accepted. It can not be right that one partner in the common enterprise should recover all that she has lent, and that another, while recovering nothing, should be required to pay all that she has borrowed. Such a procedure is contrary to every principle of natural justice and can not be expected to commend itself to the people of this country. They are suffering from an unparalleled burden of taxation, from an immense diminution in national wealth, from serious want of employment, and from the severe curtailment of useful expenditure. These evils are courageously borne. But were they to be increased by an arrangement which, however legitimate, is obviously one sided, the British taxpayer would inevitably ask why he should be singled out to bear a burden which others are bound to share.

To such a question there can be but one answer, and I am convinced that allied opinion will admit its justice. But while His Majesty's Government are thus regretfully constrained to request the French Government to make arrangements for dealing to the best of their ability with Anglo-French loans, they desire to explain that the amount of interest and repayment for which they ask depends not so much on what France and other allies owe to Great Britain as on what Great Britain has to pay America. The policy favored by His Majesty is, as I have already observed, that of surrendering their share of German reparation, and writing off, through one great transaction, the whole body of interallied indebtedness. But, if this be found impossible of accomplishment, we wish it to be understood that we do not in any event desire to make a profit out of any less satisfactory arrangement. In no circumstances do we propose to ask more from our debtors than is necessary to pay to our creditors. And, while we do not ask for more, all will admit that we can hardly be content with less. For it should not be forgotten, though it sometimes is, that our liabilities were incurred for others, not for ourselves. The food, the raw material, the munitions required by the immense naval and military efforts of Great Britain and half the two thousand million sterling advanced to allies were provided not by means of foreign loans, but by internal borrowing and war taxation. Unfortunately, a similar policy was beyond the power of other European nations. Appeal was therefore made to the Government of the United States; and under the arrangement then arrived at the United States insisted, in substance, if not in form, that, though our allies were to spend the money, it was only on our security that they were prepared to lend it. This cooperative effort was of infinite value to the common cause; but it can not be said that the rôle assigned in it to this country was one of special privilege or advantage.

Before concluding I may be permitted to offer one further observation in order to make still clearer the spirit in which His Majesty's Government desire to deal with the thorny problem of international indebtedness.

In an earlier passage of this dispatch I pointed out that this after all is not a question merely between allies. Ex-enemy countries also are involved; for the greatest of all international debtors is Germany. Now, His Majesty's Government do not suggest that, either as a matter of justice or expediency, Germany should be relieved of her obligation to the other allied States. They speak only for Great Britain; and they content themselves with saying once again that so deeply are they convinced of the economic injury inflicted on the world by the existing state of things that this country would be prepared (subject to the just claims of other parts of the Empire) to abandon all further right to German reparation and all claims to repayment by allies, provided that this renunciation formed part of a general plan by which this great problem could be dealt with as a whole and find a satisfactory solution. A general settlement would, in their view, be of more value to mankind than any gains that could accrue even from the most successful enforcement of legal obligations.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10874) to provide adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended the accompanying conference report:

The following amendments are clerical changes, and the House recedes: 15, 19, 33, 34, and 37.

On amendment No. 4: The House bill provided that all applications for the benefits granted the veteran by the act must be made prior to July 1, 1923. The Senate amendment provides that such applications may be made at any time after the passage of the act. The House recedes with an amendment requiring that the applications be made on or before January 1, 1928.

On amendment No. 10: The Senate amendment provides that the findings of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy as to the number of days of service in the military and naval forces of the veteran shall not be subject to review by the General Accounting Office, and that payments made by the disbursing officers of the War and Navy Departments in accordance with such findings shall be passed to their credit. The House bill contained no provision upon this subject; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 13: The House bill provided that in case of a veteran serving in both the military and naval forces payments should be made the veteran by the Secretary of War if the last service of the veteran was with the military forces, and by the Secretary of the Navy if the last service was with the naval forces The Senate amendment directs that payments shall be made by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, according to the force in which the veteran first served during the compensable period, instead of according to the force in which the veteran last served; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 14: The House bill provided that the rights conferred by the adjusted-service certificates should take effect and the certificates should be dated as of October 1, 1922. The Senate amendment provides that such rights shall take effect and the certificate be dated as of the 1st day of January or July (whichever first occurs) next succeeding the date of filing the application, but in no case before January 1, 1923; and the House recedes.

The following amendments are the additional changes necessary in the adjusted-service certificate title in order to carry out the action agreed upon by the conferees in respect to amendment No. 14, and the House recedes: 16, 17, 18, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 28, 29, 30, 31, 35, 39, and 43.

On amendment No. 27: The House bill provided that in case of the continued default of the veteran as to the payment of any loan made him by a bank and the subsequent payment by the Secretary of the Treasury to the bank of the amount due it, the Secretary should thereupon cancel the note and the certificate and pay to the veteran, if living, the difference between 80 per cent of the loan basis of the certificate and amount paid the bank, and that if the veteran died before such difference was paid, it should be paid to the beneficiary, or, if no beneficiary, to the estate of the veteran. The Senate amendment provides that in such case the certificate shall not be canceled, but shall be held by the Secretary and restored to the veteran if at any time prior to its maturity he repays the amount paid by the United States to the bank, together with interest thereon at 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually; and the House recedes.

The following amendments are additional changes necessary to carry out the action agreed upon by the conferees in respect to amendment No. 27, and the House recedes: 26, 32, 40, 41, 42, and 44.

On amendment No. 36: The House bill provided that if a loan is made by the Government upon an adjusted service certificate during the three years prior to October 1, 1928, the amount of the loan should not exceed 85 per cent of the sum of the adjusted service credit plus interest thereon from October 1, 1922, to the date of the loan, at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually. If the loan is made at any time thereafter the House bill provided that it should not exceed 70 per cent of the sum of 125 per cent of the adjusted service credit plus interest thereon from October 1, 1922, to the date of the making of the loan, at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually. The Senate amendment provides that if the loan is made at any time during the three years after the date of the certificate it shall not exceed 50 per cent of the adjusted service credit plus interest from the date of the certificate to the making of the loan at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually. If made at any time during the second three-year period after the date of the certificate the loan should not exceed 85 per cent of the sum of the adjusted service credit, plus interest as above; and if the loan is made at any time more than six years after the date of the certificate it should not exceed 70 per cent of the sum of 125 per cent of the adjusted service credit, plus interest as above; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 38: This amendment carries out the action agreed upon by the conferees in respect to amendment No. 36; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 45: The Senate amendment provides that the adjusted service certificate shall be canceled if the veteran fails to redeem it before maturity, or if he fails to make any payment due on the loan and such default continues to his death. The House bill provided for the absolute cancellation of the certificate in case of default. (See subdivision (c) section 502 and subdivision (b) section 504.) The House recedes with an amendment making slight clerical changes for the purpose of clarity.

On amendment No. 47: The House bill provided that the amount of the payment for farm and home aid should be 125 per cent of the adjusted service credit. The Senate amendment provides that the amount of such aid shall be graduated from 100 per cent to 140 per cent, depending on the year in which the payment or first installment thereof is made; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 49: The Senate amendment provides that farm or home aid may be used for the purpose of paying off indebtedness existing on a home or farm prior to the date of the application by the veteran for the aid. The House bill had no provision on the subject; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 61: The amendment makes clerical changes; and the House recedes with an amendment making further clerical changes.

On amendment No. 62: The House bill provided for the creation of a national veterans' settlement board to administer the provisions of the bill with respect to farm and home aid and land reclamation. Reclamation projects are to be established by the board and made available to settlement by veterans and repatriates only, the individual veteran or repatriate to reimburse the Government for the cost of reclaiming the lands by amortization payments covering a period not exceeding 25 years. The moneys from such reimbursements are to be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. The amount of the adjusted service credit of the veteran was to be deducted from the price to the veteran of the reclaimed land. The provision constituted one of the five options available to the veteran under the act.

The Senate amendment strikes out the House provision and provides land settlement advantages which are to be exercised, but not as an option in lieu of the other advantages granted by the act, but as an additional privilege. Reclamation projects are to be established under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in cooperation with municipal drainage and irrigation districts. The district agrees to reimburse the Government for all expenditures made by it and to issue bonds so obligating itself. The bonds are to be deposited with the Federal Farm Loan Board and to be offered at public sale at such time as the value of the reclaimed lands is twice the par value of the bonds. The moneys repaid by the districts, however, are to constitute a revolving fund, and $350,000,000 is authorized to be appropriated for the purpose of this fund. The veteran has a preference right to employment in the construction work on reclamation projects and also a preference for a period of 60 days in making entry on the reclaimed land.

The House recedes with an amendment striking out the new provisions proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment. The effect of the agreement is that the bill contains neither a veterans' land settlement nor a general reclamation feature.

The following amendments are changes necessary to carry out the action agreed upon by the conferees in respect to amendment No. 62, and the House recedes: 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 46, 48, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 63, 64, 65, 66, and 67.

The following amendment is an amendment necessary to carry out the action agreed upon by the conferees in respect to amendment No. 62, and the Senate recedes: 1.

On amendment No. 68: The House bill provided (see sec. 904) that an amount sufficient to defray the expenditures required by the act was authorized to be appropriated. The Senate amendment retains the House provision, but in addition provides that the interest received by the United States on obligations of foreign governments is first to be used in meeting such expenditures; and the Senate recedes.

J. W. FORDNEY,
W. R. GREEN,
NICHOLAS LONGWORTH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FORDNEY. Gentlemen of the House, I will be very brief in what I have to say.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire at this time to make a point of order on the conference report.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is too late.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is too late now; debate has begun. The gentleman from Michigan has been recognized and began his speech.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Wyoming was not on his feet.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Wyoming will say that he intended to make the point of order before debate began, the Chair will hear him.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I expected the point of order would be made by some one else; I was told it would be. I waited for a moment, and the point of order was not made, and as soon as I saw the point of order was not to be made by the other party I made it. The debate had not started when I rose to my feet.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his point of order—he surely does not want the bill defeated—and there is no benefit to be derived from making the point of order. I feel quite sure that I am within my rights in insisting that the gentleman from Wyoming is too late with his point of order.

The SPEAKER. It often happens that Members wishing to make points of order and other technical objections are too late, but the Chair has always been in the habit of stating that if the gentleman states that he intended to comply with the rule, the Chair would not attempt to decide the question of fact whether he was or was not late, but would leave it to the Member. If the gentleman from Wyoming states, knowing as he does the rule, that he intended to come within the rule, the Chair will hear him.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the conferees have exceeded their authority in striking from the bill what was Title VIII, under the caption, "Land Settlement Reclamation—National Veterans' Settlement Board." It is on pages 29 to 40.

Mr. Speaker, it is with extreme reluctance that I make this point of order. I was a little slow in making the point of order, because I had been assured that another gentleman intended to make it. I was waiting for him, but for some reason he changed his mind. I regret exceedingly to make the point of order on this bill, and I should not do so if I believed or had any notion that the rereference of the bill to the conferees would long delay the legislation. I am sure that it would not. I am constrained to make the point of order because I think the conferees have so far exceeded their authority that if the matter were allowed to go unchallenged it would create a precedent that would plague us in legislation for all time to come.

The House bill contains what is known as "Title VIII, land settlement," "National Veterans' Settlement Board" being the first subhead. It is contained in pages 29 to 40 of the House bill and is a complete land reclamation provision. It provides for the creation of a board of which the Secretary of the Interior was to be the chairman. It authorizes this board to enter upon the work of land reclamation on behalf of veterans. It provides in detail for the manner of the reclamation development, the division of the land, the settlement of veterans upon the land, and the method of payment, the object of it all being to reclaim lands, swamp and arid, under the system provided for in the bill.

The Senate committee struck out this land settlement provision and inserted a brief provision in lieu giving the veterans preference in settlement upon land that might be opened under the public land laws. The Senate by a very considerable majority wrote into the bill an amendment in the form of what has been known as the Smith-McNary reclamation bill, with some changes and modifications to fit the measure.

The Smith-McNary land reclamation bill is like the provision contained in the House bill, a land reclamation measure providing for the reclamation of swamp and arid lands. Like the House bill it made provision as to the executive authority over these developments. Like the House bill it made the Secretary of the Interior the officer charged with initial responsibility. Like the House bill it provided for projects of land development. Like the House bill it provided for dividing the projects into farms. Like the House bill it provided for the settlement upon those farms of war veterans.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a minute. Like the House measure it provided for the full repayment of expenditures made by the Federal Government and provided for the passing of those farm lands into the hands of the soldiers of the World War. The two projects are identical in their general scope, in their ultimate purpose.

The procedure differs somewhat, but the plans proposed in both cases provide for the selection of projects to be developed by irrigation or drainage or otherwise, the divisions of those lands into farms, the settlement of those farms by the veterans of the late war, and for the repayment to the Federal Government for the expenditure upon the lands. Both provided that all of this should be done out of appropriations based on estimates made as they will be for the other expenditures under the bill. Now, Mr. Speaker, if conferees may strike from a measure like this one of its most important provisions and leave no vestige of it, no sign of its being, nothing but a vacuum where both Houses have legislated on the same subject, then there is nothing conferees may not do. They may strike from every bill going from the House to the Senate or from the Senate to the House which is amended in the other body by way of substitute everything between the enacting clause and the signature of the presiding officer of the body in which the bill originates. Did the gentleman from New York desire to ask me a question?

Mr. MILLS. No; not at the moment, I do not care to do so.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, it will be argued that while the subject matter is the same, while the purpose and object is the same, while the result would be the same, the procedure differs. Well, that is true. That is always true when two minds or two bodies approach the same subject matter from different viewpoints. It is inevitable that it should be so. But these two measures are singularly identical in their purpose and intent, and would be practically identical in their accomplishment. Both Houses agreed to the plan and purpose of the reclamation of land for the benefit of the soldier under the administration of a department of the Government on projects selected by the Government, built by the Government, administered by the Government, divided into farms and settled by the veterans.

We shall seldom find measures drawn by different individuals more nearly alike than these two plans are in essential particulars effecting the object sought and the purpose accomplished. If conferees may strike Title VIII out of the bill they could have stricken Title I from the bill, Title II, Title III, Title IV, Title V, Title VI, and all the way along the line if there had been any material difference of opinion between the two Houses on the subject. Gentlemen will argue that the Senate substituted entirely new matter for the House provision. Well, that is frequently done. The Senate and the House both frequently substitute entirely new matter for the provisions of a bill. And if that changed the situation, if that created a condition under which it might be argued that the way to reach an agreement between the two Houses was to annul and wipe out all they had done, then it would be entirely proper to strike from a bill where the Senate substituted entirely new matter for the contents of the House bill everything between the enacting clause and the signature of the Speaker and say that thus we arrived at an agreement between the two Houses. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me repeat that it is with very great reluctance that I raise the question of order in regard to this bill. I want to see it pass, and it will pass. Its return to the conferees need not delay its passage 24 hours, and would not delay its passage 24 hours. If the act of the conferees had not been of a character so far-reaching, so dangerous to the future of this House, I certainly should not have raised the question, much as I am interested in this particular feature of the bill that has been eliminated. I repeat if conferees may do what they have done in this case, then there is practically no limit to the authority of the conferees to strike provisions from a bill where the subject matter inserted by one House differs in phraseology from the subject matter inserted in the other.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, the House passed Title VIII, setting up a National Veterans' Settlement Board and a plan for the reclamation and settlement of lands. The bill went to the Senate and the Senate struck out the entire subject matter of Title VIII, even the title, except the word "land," and substituted therefor an entirely different proposition. If it should be attempted to maintain, as the gentleman from Wyoming has done, that these two proposed plans are in effect the same, it would follow that the Speaker will have to go through the bill line by line and decide whether the two different propositions are in fact and in detail the same in effect.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The two propositions, Mr. Speaker, are entirely different. The project of the House was a national project for soldiers only, adopted by the National Government. The Senate project is essentially a State project, which provides, as the House title did not, for the creation of districts by the States, which form the basis of the operation of the whole provision. The House provision was confined entirely to the veterans of the late war. The Senate provision is open to anyone. I could go on enumerating in every paragraph essential and vital differences, so that the two constitute a complete and absolute difference in the essential features.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman's statement is entirely correct, and it is my contention that with such a state of facts it is absurd from the parliamentary standpoint that a presiding officer should be required to go through the two propositions in detail and determine whether there was sufficient similarity between the two to cause them to be of the same effect.

The parliamentary rule under which this question arises is embodied in paragraph 2 of Senate Rule XXVII. I shall read only the part applicable in this case:

> The conferees shall not insert in their report matter not committed to them by either House, nor shall they strike from the bill matter agreed to by both Houses.

The last clause is that under which this point of order is raised. As shown by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] and as appears from the report itself, the conferees have not stricken out anything that was agreed to by both Houses.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I do.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman refers to amendment No. 62, I do not think he will make that statement. If he will refer to the House bill and the Senate provision he will notice that amendment No. 61 undertakes to clear up amendment 62. Amendment 61 strikes out provisions that have been agreed to by both Houses. If the gentleman will examine the House bill and the Senate bill as it went to the conference he will find that under amendment 62 they struck out provisions agreed to by both Houses, in order to clear up amendment No. 62.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas will not contend that there is any specific plan or proposition that has been agreed to by both Houses. Does the gentleman so contend?

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Connecticut will not say that Title VIII, respecting lands, is not in conference?

Mr. TILSON. In my opening statement I said that all of Title VIII as passed by the House was stricken out except the word "land."

Mr. GARNER. I merely call the Speaker's attention to the fact that if you are going to take the position that all that was agreed to by the two Houses shall remain in the bill, then amendment 61 is subject to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not care to hear gentlemen's views concerning the title or word "land."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I would like to say to the gentleman from Connecticut that the rule from which he quoted is a Senate rule rather than a House rule, and it does not necessarily have to come within the terms of that rule, but is covered by general parliamentary law. I think the House rules contain no specific rule on the subject, but of course the general parliamentary rule would cover it. The gentleman's argument would not have to bring it within that Senate rule.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me there is absolutely nothing in the contention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. If that were true as to the word "land" found in the provisions of either bill, then we could not get rid of it. The word "land" absolutely means nothing.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. According to the gentleman's contention, what is wrong in Title VIII? Do you want us to pass a bill here with the Title VIII entitled "Land" standing alone?

Mr. GREEN. Oh, no; we do not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why not?

Mr. MONDELL. In other words, land reclamation, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TILSON. I am not so sure as to that. The word "reclamation" appears in italics and the word "land" in roman capitals, so that the word "reclamation" appears to have been substituted for "settlement" in the Senate. I do not believe that the gentleman from Wyoming will contend that the words "Title VIII, Land," standing alone, constitute a definite proposition.

The rule cited by me, although a Senate rule, is a general parliamentary proposition. It is found in Jefferson's Manual on page 231, and while it is a general parliamentary rule it is the rule of this House where not otherwise provided.

Mr. Speaker, when the conferees representing the two Houses disagree, one proposing one plan and the other another entirely different plan, as in this case, then the difference between them in a parliamentary sense is as wide as the poles. The whole world lies between them, and they can write in anything that is germane to the subject matter under consideration. If this be true—and it is true—then the conferees in this bill could have stricken out both propositions and written in an innocuous proposition that would mean nothing. As a parliamentary proposition this can not be denied. They could have inserted a plan that would begin to operate in the year 3,000, and the gentleman will not contend that they did not have the right to do so under the parliamentary situation. If it be so, that they could have written in anything they pleased that would have entirely neutralized the effect of what both Houses did, then it must be so that they could strike out both entirely. How else could they reach an agreement? The House has made one proposition, the Senate has made an entirely different proposition, because no independent substantive proposition can be claimed to have been agreed upon by both Houses. If neither House is willing to accept in toto the work of the other and a third proposition can not be agreed upon, how can they reach an agreement except by discarding the propositions of both Houses?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Frequently bills are passed by the House and go to the Senate, and the Senate strikes out all after the enacting clause and inserts a new bill or a new provision entirely. Now, I should like to ask if it is the gentleman's idea that it is within the power of the conferees under the rule to disagree to both bills and report back simply the enacting clause?

Mr. TILSON. This is not a parallel case at all. It is sufficient to maintain that if a certain proposition is in a bill as it passes the House and an entirely different one is substituted for it in the Senate, then the conferees can agree that neither proposition shall prevail, and that the bill shall be reported back without either.

Mr. DENISON. Of course they can report back a disagreement on the bill, but what I want to know is whether under the rule they can simply report back the enacting clause and in that way kill the bill?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is not this case.

Mr. DENISON. If they can do that with reference to one title they can do it with reference to all the titles in a bill.

Mr. TILSON. The supposed case and the one under consideration raise different questions entirely. They are not similar cases at all. Here there is a substantial bill left. Only a single feature of the bill is eliminated by the action of the conferees. I submit that both propositions may be dropped by the conferees, because the scope of their conference is unlimited. It must be admitted that they can effectually destroy the work of the two Houses by reporting back an innocuous proposition. Surely it is permissible for them to do directly what they may properly accomplish by indirection, to strike out the matter inserted by both Houses without substituting anything for it.

Mr. ROSE. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has submitted the question whether or not the conferees have requested the House to pass Title VIII with nothing in it but the word "land." I rise to call the attention of the gentleman to amendment numbered 61, which takes care for the elimination of the words "Title VIII—Land." To my mind, amendment numbered 61 in the conference report completely answers that question.

Mr. TILSON. I believe that the Speaker has indicated that he does not care to hear argument on the matter referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, therefore I shall not allude to it.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the essense of this proposition is whether the Senate provision and the House provision are similar in character. As a matter of fact, the only thing which these two sections have in common is that they deal with land. The House proposition was a land-settlement plan exclusively for the benefit of the veterans, intended solely for the benefit of the veterans. I refer the Speaker to section C on page 35. The Senate plan has but to be read to make it perfectly clear that it is in substance a reclamation measure and that the benefit to the veterans is only incidental, so incidental that in a vast project in which hundreds of millions of dollars are involved the sole reference to the veteran is to give him an exclusive option but for the brief period of 60 days. One is a land-settlement plan for the veteran. The other is a reclamation scheme in which the veteran plays little or no part whatsoever.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it must be obvious that had the House plan gone to the Senate and been eliminated by the Senate the House conferees could have agreed to its rejection. It must be obvious that had the bill gone to the Senate without any such provision and the Senate had included the reclamation project the conferees could have agreed to eliminate it, and no such point of order could have been raised. But it is now contended that because the Senate had a project and the House had a project, even though each standing alone could have been eliminated, that because the two of them exist they can not be eliminated. It seems to me that as a matter of logic and common sense the proposition is so unsound that it must be rejected and that the point of order should not be sustained. [Applause.]

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, it is very plain from the reading of the two provisions, the Mondell provision in the House bill and the Smith-McNary amendment adopted in the Senate, that the major purpose of the House provision and also of the Senate provision was a soldier land-settlement plan. Under both plans private landowners will secure some incidental benefit, but the major benefit is accorded to the soldiers under both the House and the Senate provision. The House bill provides for the use of private lands, and necessarily so, because it is impossible to secure a sufficient area of land for a project without there being some privately owned lands in the project. Both the Senate provision and the House provision recognize that fact and permit the private landowner to retain in the contemplated project not to exceed 160 acres, and 160 acres only. In so far it is a general reclamation scheme, but both bills contain that same provision. The House bill provides in section b on page 31—

> In case any project includes privately owned lands, no construction work shall be commenced upon the project until the owners of all such lands in the project have each conveyed or agreed to convey to the United States the title to all land owned by him in excess of a farm unit as established for the project under the provisions of section 806.

Now, that meets the assertion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] that the House bill is exclusively a soldier provision. It is not exclusively a soldier provision, because the private landowner may reap some benefit from it; he may retain a farm unit. That which I have read is from the House bill. Now, we have a kindred and analogous provision in the Senate amendment, section 803, on page 42—

> That before construction of a project is commenced the size of the farms therein shall be established and agreements shall be made effectively, subjecting not less than 80 per cent of the excess lands within the project to disposal by authority of the Secretary to settlers at prices and terms fixed in advance of such agreements—

And so forth.

Now, under the Senate provision 80 per cent of the excess lands are to be surrendered for the settlers. Who are the settlers? The settlers under another provision of the Senate bill are the soldiers, who are given a preference right first to settle upon this land. There is the soldier feature of the Senate bill. But the private landowner may retain in the Senate bill, just as he retains in the House bill, his 160 acres. So the bills are very similar. As far as the private landowner is concerned, the private landowner is considered in both bills.

But, Mr. Speaker, the main thing, it seems to me, for the Speaker to take into consideration is the fact that both the House and the Senate embrace the same proposition, namely, a land-reclamation scheme in which the soldier receives the major part of the benefit. The details were different in the Senate than in the House bill. It seems to me that the conferees should not be permitted wholly to ignore the views of the House and the views of the Senate, that the ex-service men are entitled to the benefit of a land-settlement provision; in presenting this conference report with both the House and Senate provisions eliminated, it seems to me that they have entirely ignored the central idea, at least the essence, of that which the Senate and the House had agreed upon—the land provision for soldiers. It was the duty of the conferees to adjust the differences between the two provisions, and they exceeded their authority when both provisions were eliminated.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Does not the action on the part of the conference committee save $350,000,000 to the Federal Government?

The SPEAKER. That is immaterial to the point of order.

Mr. SINNOTT. That is not material to the discussion of the point of order.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has a pretty decided opinion, but he will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the Chair is ready to rule, I will not take the floor.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, may I have another word? I am much interested in this land-settlement and land-reclamation provision of the bill. I think that, take it all in all, it is the very best provision in the bill, and in the course of time would prove to be so—helpful to the soldier and useful to the country. But notwithstanding that interest, I am so anxious to have this conference report adopted that I should not have raised the question were it not for the fact that I think a precedent may be established which is dangerous and likely to be harmful in the future. Conferees have quite authority enough under the rules of the House as they have been interpreted heretofore. It is possible for a conference committee making a report on a bill containing many provisions to modify profoundly, and not altogether to the liking of either body, many of the provisions of a bill and yet get by, because under the rules, except for the motion to recommit, the conference report must be voted up or down. No matter what this conference report might contain, if there remained in the measure the features that have been most approved practically every Member of the House favorable to the legislation would feel constrained to vote for the conference report, however much he might regret some of the provisions. The House has been compelled constantly to guard against the encroachments of conferees on the rights of the House.

I call the Chair's attention to this very significant fact, that there can not be found in the reported precedents a single case—at least I have found none—where the conferees have stricken from a bill important subject matter that had been passed upon by both Houses. Some gentlemen have suggested that that is proof that it has been done without protest. On the contrary, it is proof positive and conclusive that no conferees have ever assumed the authority or jurisdiction justifying any such action. It has never been done, and therefore there have been no arguments on the subject.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Suppose in an important bill like this, covering many provisions, you have one affirmative matter like the matter stricken out here, and suppose the conferees for the House were unwilling to agree upon the amendment offered by the Senate and the conferees of the Senate were unwilling to agree to the proposition by the House. They could not agree on an affirmative proposition, and if the gentleman's contention was right they would absolutely have to report a disagreement on the whole bill because they were unable to agree on an affirmative proposition to take the place of the two, although it might be a matter of minor importance in considering the whole bill.

Mr. MONDELL. As the action of the conferees would be contrary to the rules of the House in striking out provisions contained in a bill, of course they must come back for instructions when they can not agree on a compromise. There is no question about that, but the fact is that these were not entirely dissimilar propositions. It would have been the easiest thing in the world for the conferees to have reached an agreement either to adopt one or the other, or to have adopted certain features of each.

The important difference between the two lies in the fact that in one case the Secretary provides for the reclamation of the land directly without the interposition of any other agency and in the other case it was provided that there should be a municipal organization. It would have been the easiest thing in the world to have modified either measure in that regard or to have provided that projects might be either under district organization or without such organization. As a matter of fact, the House bill specifically authorized the plan of district organization that the Senate measure adopted exclusively.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is in error.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is not in error. Unlike the gentleman from Iowa, the gentleman from Wyoming knows the two measures.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I ought to know something about it. I drafted the original provision and I ought to know about it. I was on the subcommittee that prepared it.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman had something to do with the modification of the House provision. The gentleman did not draw the House bill; I introduced the House provision originally as a separate bill in the House, and it was reported by the Committee on Public Lands after very careful consideration. The legislative committee of the American Legion presented it to the Ways and Means Committee in the Sixty-sixth Congress as the first feature of their fourfold plan. It came as a recommendation from that organization in substance as it had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands. Later it was somewhat modified by the committee, but in all of its essential features it remained the same measure that was reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

The gentleman from Iowa says there was no provision in the House bill with regard to the organization of districts. I want to answer that because gentlemen are basing their entire case on a misunderstanding of the facts. I would not want to suggest that the gentlemen have any disposition to knowingly misstate the facts, but when gentlemen say these are two entirely dissimilar propositions that could not be compromised or adjusted, they display their lack of information with regard to the legislation.

The measures are similar not only in intent, purpose, and subject matter, but they are largely similar in the provisions they contain.

Here is the House bill with regard to the matter of organization, page 31, line 19:

> The board may, in its discretion, contract with any irrigation or drainage district or other public corporation organized under the laws of the State in which the project is located to establish, develop, improve, and otherwise cooperate (in accordance with the provisions of this title) in the execution of and the administration of the affairs of any project comprising only the lands of such district or corporation.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] made a very interesting argument, and it would have been pertinent to the discussion if it had been based upon the facts of the case; but unfortunately it was not. He suggested a measure presented in one House having to do with a certain matter in a certain way, and a provision introduced in the other House occupying the same space in the bill but dealing with a different subject. And then he suggested that there would be no way to bring the minds of the two Houses together. That is true; but that is not the condition of affairs in this case. Here are two provisions identical in subject matter, purpose, and intent, and differing only in the details of plan and execution.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa suggests that the Speaker is not called upon to examine carefully the provisions of a bill to see whether the conferees have exceeded their authority. I agree to that. But the Speaker is charged with the responsibility of examining provisions of the bill when the act of the conferees is challenged and when his attention is called to what they have done. Here is a complete subject matter passed upon by both Houses favorably, considered at both ends of the Capitol, and eliminated completely from the bill, and it is claimed that the conferees have the authority to do that. Mr. Speaker, let me say in conclusion that if they have, then it is most unfortunate for the House. If that be the rule, the House must be constantly on its guard to see to it that the minds of the two Houses not only run in parallel lines as to the plan and purpose, but that their intent is expressed in similar language, or conferees assuming an authority which they do not possess may eliminate the entire matter from a bill. Mr. Speaker, no harm will come to this measure by rereferring it to the conferees, for in that case it will be returned at once; but infinite harm may come to this House if it shall be adjudged and determined that the conferees may do what was done in this case.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a half minute. When the gentleman from Wyoming indulges in the kind of language he has used with reference to those opposing his position, it is quite evident that he is short of argument or he would not use it.

This provision, Title VIII, is only one of a number of provisions as to how the essential features of this bill may be carried out. The purpose of the bill was to compensate the soldiers, and the main purpose of the bill will be preserved and carried out, whatever is done with this provision. Of the two provisions under discussion the one by the House was national in its character, carried on by the National Government for the soldiers alone, while the one by the Senate was to be carried on mostly by the States for the benefit of anyone who applied.

Snce there has been some intimation that the conferees disregarded the will of the House, permit me to state that the conferees took these provisions out by reason of the objections of the President to them as a part of this bill. This bill must receive the signature of the President before it goes on the statute books, and the conferees did not want matter in which they felt satisfied would prevent it ever becoming a law.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the proposition here presented is rather a novel one, and novel because of the form in which the Senate amendment appears rather than because it is novel in itself. Suppose, for example, the Senate had adopted one amendment striking out the House provision and had adopted a second amendment inserting a new provision on the same subject. It would be clearly within the power of the conferees to agree to both Senate amendments, which would have had exactly the same effect as the action of the conferees now has—that is, the effect of eliminating both provisions. But it is contended that because technically the Senate amendment is one amendment, an amendment striking out and inserting, therefore the subject is not before the conferees to the extent that they may eliminate both provisions. It seems to me that the mere technical fact that the Senate has made one amendment instead of two amendments dealing with either the same subject or different subjects makes no difference whatever so far as the power of the conferees is concerned. Now, it has been frequently held that where the Senate strikes out a provision and inserts another the whole subject is before the conferees, and they may go to the extent of writing entirely new language on the subject. If the conferees have the authority to write an entirely new bill, can it be said they can not eliminate a provision which the House has inserted and a provision which the Senate has inserted, when neither the House nor the Senate has agreed to the provisions of the other? Is not the test of a case of this kind an answer to the question of whether the conferees have stricken from the bill language which both the House and the Senate have agreed to?

Mr. SINNOTT. But is not the vice of the gentleman's argument that when they write a new bill the conferees endeavor to reconcile the differences between the two Houses, whereas here they totally ignore the views of both Houses and kick both out?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think that follows at all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota singularly enough has brought out exactly what has been in the mind of the Chair while listening to this debate. The House inserted a reclamation bill. The Senate struck it out and inserted as an amendment the bill which is familiar to all the Members of the House, the Smith-McNary bill. The House provision was much more for the veterans than the Senate bill, but that is immaterial. There was a very wide distinction between the two bills, so that the Chair would be inclined to think that if the Senate bill had been offered as an amendment to the House bill, and a point of order was raised, it would probably have been ruled out. But, as the gentleman from Minnesota just stated, if the two amendments had not been coupled by the Senate in one motion to strike out and insert no question at all could have been raised. The House could have given up its provision, and the Senate could have given up its provision, and nobody would have questioned the right of the conferees to report with all the land legislation out. So the question comes back to the mere technical point: Because there was one motion in the Senate to strike out and insert, is that to limit the power which the conferees otherwise would have? The differences between the two bills were so infinite that the conferees could have brought back almost any legislation they pleased on the subject. Is the only thing they can not do to omit all legislation? The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] argues, and strongly, that the conferees are limited to the differences between the two Houses, and can not exceed them. Of course that question of the differences ordinarily comes on an appropriation bill, where one House has, for instance, $1,000 and the other $2,000. The conferees can not go below $1,000 or above $2,000. But here are two bills or amendments on a great subject entirely different. Almost every conceivable bill could have been reported as a compromise between the two bills. And shall the conferees be forbidden by a mere technicality to strike out both, which is, it seems to the Chair, a much more natural compromise and much less far-reaching than what it is admitted they have the power to do? The two Houses came to an impasse; the conferees can not come to any compromise between the two bills; they will not take either, and therefore they agree that they will strike out both. It seems to the Chair that the conferees have not exceeded their authority, and the Chair overrules the point of order. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker and gentleman of the House, I shall be very brief. Within the hour that I have under the rules I have agreed to divide the time and yield one-half to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. I wish to say to the gentlemen of the House that there were three important questions settled in conference relating to matters in this bonus bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, without its coming out of the gentleman's time, will the gentleman please restate the matter of the distribution of time?

Mr. FORDNEY. Of the one hour which I have under the rule I have agreed to yield one-half to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], which is agreeable to him, and during his absence he requested me to yield time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAREW]. At the end of the hour I shall move the previous question on the vote on the conference report.

The three important changes are these: First, the House bill provided that the application for bonus must be made before the 1st of July, 1923, but the provisions of the bill should go into effect on the 1st of October, 1922. The Senate changed the effective date to January 1, 1923, and struck out the limitation of time in which the soldier could make application. The conferees agreed upon five years' limitation, from January 1, 1923, to January 1, 1928.

The Senate added to the bill a provision that the interest on the obligations of foreign governments indebted to our Government could be used in paying the claims of the soldier boys. That provision has been stricken from the bill. Whatever use may be made of that money when it is received, it was our opinion that no such provision should remain in the bill, for it might greatly embarrass the commission whose duty it is to settle those foreign claims. That provision has been stricken from the bill.

The other provision was the land-settlement proposition, which has been so fully discussed this morning.

These are the three chief changes in the bill from the form in which it passed the House. I believe that every Member of the House is so fully informed and so fully decided in his own opinion as to how he is going to vote on the conference report that it is not necessary for me to take up any more time in presenting the matter to the House. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the concluding remarks made by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. FORDNEY] that everyone, I presume, has fully made up his mind on this bill as to how he will vote. I find no reason for changing my vote from what it was when the bill was before the House. No provision has been made for the payment of this bounty, this bonus, or this compensation, whatever it may be called, and until there is a proper source from which the funds can be drawn provided for this measure I shall record my vote against it.

I want to call the attention of the House, however, if gentlemen will pardon me, to another matter. It is the question of the importance of our parliamentary procedure. Yesterday we had a decision by the Chair upon a very interesting question. An appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair and that appeal was voted on, and the picture was presented of 147 Members voting to sustain the appeal and 150 against it. I wish briefly to restate and then give what I conceive to be a timely suggestion to my colleagues upon this subject.

An emergency tariff act had been passed in which article 5 of the emergency tariff act operated as an embargo on certain dyestuffs. This embargo had a limited life and would at the time when the tariff bill passed the House have expired in a few months. The tariff bill passed the House in July. In November an act was passed, in the passage of which the House necessarily joined, providing that the embargo should continue for an indefinite period. The words in the act "until repealed by law" have no legal significance, for every general law remains a law naturally until changed by law. This language neither added to nor detracted from the effect of the November law indefinitely extending the embargo covered in Title V of the emergency act.

The Senate inserted in the present tariff bill a clause repealing the embargo. The House disagreed with the Senate amendments and ordered the bill to conference. Now, unless the bill as it left the House contained an implied or expressed repeal of the embargo, then this new matter would be properly matter in which the House had not concurred and which the conference committee could consider. This they did, and in lieu of a total immediate repeal of the embargo, provided for a continuance for a year, thus qualifying the repeal and the Senate amendment.

Is this action subject to a point of order on the ground that this subject was new matter and not germane to the bill?

The House bill contained no reference to the embargo. The question then arises, Would the House bill, if it became a law, have repealed by implication the embargo law? Clearly no! The tariff bill could not have been said to be inconsistent with the embargo law. To repeal by implication there must be such conflicting provisions as would make it impossible for both to stand.

The tariff bill does not provide that goods enumerated in it may be admitted into the country; it only legislates on rates. It merely provides: "That on and after a certain date (the passage of the act) there shall be levied and collected upon all articles when imported from any foreign country, and so forth, the rate of duties prescribed." The House bill only fixed rates of duty upon goods "when imported." The embargo forbidding the importation of certain articles could exist, because it does not conflict with the provisions of the House bill.

It was argued that fixing rates of duty upon articles embargoed by law meant that they should come in on payment of the duty, hence the bill was in conflict with the embargo, and therefore repealed the embargo and made the House bill really in accord with the Senate amendment. This does not and can not be reasonably claimed. The tariff measure only provided "when imported" duties would be as fixed in the schedules. During the continuance of the embargo the goods covered by it could not be imported. No conflict whatever. But if and when the embargo should be repealed then the House measure fixes the rates which such goods or articles should pay; otherwise, when the embargo should be repealed, the goods would come in free. No conflict exists which would warrant the conclusion of a repeal by implication.

Does the general clause providing that all acts in conflict with the bill in question, when it would become a law, "are hereby repealed" affect the question? No; not at all. The two laws would not be in conflict, for one only provided rates to be charged on goods "when imported," and the other excluded certain goods. Both laws could stand. This expressed provision is no stronger, however, than the doctrines of repeal by implication wherever there is an irreconcilable conflict between an old and a new law.

The point of order did not involve in any way the question of approval or disapproval of an embargo. It did not turn for decision on that. It does not turn on whether or not the conference committee acted wisely in meeting the Senate's repeal clause by a clause limiting the effect of the repeal—it turns only and solely on the point: Was the subject within the matters in disagreement between the House and Senate? The Senate introduced a repeal clause. The House bill did not refer, in words, to the embargo law, and neither by implication nor expressed language did it repeal the embargo. Hence there was a matter which was the subject of a disagreement between the House and the Senate upon which technically and clearly within the rules of the House the conferees could lawfully act.

The Speaker was clearly right in overruling the point of order. An appeal from his decision was taken, and, although it was sustained, the vote was 147 for the appeal and 150 against—a very narrow margin. A few more votes would have reversed the decision of the Chair and placed a reflection upon the Speaker because of his decision, and that in face of the fact that he was clearly right. Decisions on parliamentary law and usage ought always to be separated from the subject in controversy and decided solely on the point involved.

It is to the honor of a long line of Speakers that they have decided such questions fairly and without partisanship. It is seldom that an appeal to the House is taken. But whenever it is, then, the duty of the House is to decide the question involved solely and only on its merits, allowing no other consideration to influence the vote. In view of past action of the House on the embargo question many Members felt aggrieved that the committee from the House should have gone contrary to the wishes of the House and others felt that the conferees of the House had exceeded their authority, and possessing these feelings they sought to express them by voting to sustain the appeal. Such action was unfair and unjust to the Speaker, illogical and improper. I know that such votes were cast, and this has led me to offer an appeal to the Members to keep our parliamentary proceedings free from such injurious alloy. Let us bury our personal and party feelings toward any measure, when we consider overruling a decision of the Chair, lest we do grave injustice to its occupant and sully our own record for impartial justice.

The House very nearly blundered into an act that would have overridden a lawful decision and made a record of unfairness in disposing of a simple point of order. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SANDERS of Indiana). The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman give me three minutes more?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I regret I have no more time to yield. Otherwise I would like to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], but I can not.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Then I shall avail myself of the leave granted.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen may have a certain number of days, say, 10 days, in which to print their remarks on this bill. It is an important matter, and many may not be able to discuss it at all, but they would like to print their remarks on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen may have 10 calendar days in which to print their remarks on this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to is here printed in full as follows:

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, on the day the so-called "soldiers' bonus bill" was vetoed by President Harding a remarkable statement appeared in the press from one of the ablest and shrewdest men of the press gallery declaring that Republican Party leaders in the House are counting on from 20 to 30 Republican majority in the next House and are conceding a possible loss of 139 to 149 Republicans from the present membership. If Henning's syndicated press statement is near verified, the political cyclone will largely be due to the blundering attitude of those who to-day are the President's closest advisers, who have foisted a vulnerable tariff bill upon the country and have urged an equally indefensible veto to the soldiers' bonus bill.

The House Republican membership will suffer for mistakes made higher up, for the President has been badly advised. No one familiar with the arguments and publicity methods of Secretary Mellon in relation to the bonus bill will believe President Harding wrote the major part of the amazing veto message which denies to nearly 4,000,000 ex-service men just recognition for their sacrifice. No one possessed of ordinary political acumen will believe the extraordinary tariff bill is satisfactory to the Executive.

Whether the estimate of Democratic Members is accurate that $3,000,000,000 increased annual burden of living will be loaded onto the American people in order to realize $100,000,000 increased annual tariff receipts will not be determined by any exact measure, but the added tariff price burden will probably equal any proposed burdensome general sales tax, demanded as the price of a bonus bill, and both combined would have sunk the ship politically.

For many months the Literary Slyjest has been carrying on an unscrupulous campaign against the so-called soldiers' bonus bill. Unscrupulous because the legislative proposal was misstated, the campaign was timed to influence the American Congress with an apparent expression of public sentiment, and because all the leading opponents of the bonus whose stronghold is New York were behind the Slyjest's effort to discredit the measure.

The United States Chamber of Commerce, that gives flamboyant pronunciamentos on legislation with little knowledge and less consideration of measures, in like manner became violent against the so-called bonus bill. But the most compelling threat against the bill, a threat that has been foremost in all demands for a sales tax or in demanded reduction of income taxes, a threat that reaches the political life and success of political organizations, constantly uttered by the press, was that political contributions by big business would not be forthcoming for the Republican campaign if the bonus bill became law. Secretary Mellon's affiliations and excessive activity will be remembered in this connection.

All considerations of just recognition and grateful remembrance for ex-soldiers were thrust aside by the interests that profited most by the war.

Read in the light of action by other Governments the President's veto message reads hollow and insincere. The President is not given to such utterances, so it must be that others, led by Secretary of the Treasury Mellon, are responsible for the veto. The veto suggested that the bill threatened national bankruptcy. When Canada, with her heavy tax burdens, gave a higher bonus to Canadian soldiers than the bill just vetoed, Canada was not fearful of national bankruptcy. When England, Italy, and Belgium gave substantial remembrances to their soldiers, they were doubly, yes twice doubly, in debt compared with our own Government. When France, bleeding France, with a debt equal to over 50 per cent of her national wealth, gave a bonus to her soldiers, she did not quibble and twist facts like some of those contained in the veto message.

Our own Government, with national estimated wealth of $250,000,000,000, owes $23,000,000,000, or less than 10 per cent of its wealth. Of this amount 80 per cent of $11,000,000,000 foreign indebtedness Secretary Mellon estimates will be paid to our Government, leaving a net debt of about $15,000,000,000, or less than 7 per cent of our national wealth, compared with over 50 per cent in France, and yet France did not quibble or seek to evade its just obligation to her ex-soldiers. The House of Representatives by a vote of 258 to 54, or nearly 5 to 1, voted to carry the bill over the President's veto. This vote was in face of the threat that money would not be forthcoming for the next political campaign. The 258 Members of Congress weighed carefully the Nation's finances, and are possibly as able to reach right conclusions of the financial burden and justice of their action as either Mr. Mellon or any other of the presidential advisers. The close vote in the Senate, with a majority of the Republican membership repudiating the President's action, is accompanied by press notices that on receipt of news of the veto Standard Oil jumped three points on the market and Steel two points, leaving a liberal margin for contributions, if cause and effect are considered.

In view of the lugubrious tone of the veto prophesying a financial calamity if the bonus bill had passed it is well to remember that if the World War had lasted six months longer our added national debt would have been about $9,000,000,000 more, or at the rate of one and a half billion dollars per month, and expense for 30 days of war will about cover the bonus bill for 4,000,000 ex-service men. We would have given $9,000,000,000 willingly to have been assured October 12, 1918, that the war would end in 30 days. When in hard straits we were placing our faith in the American doughboys, and they never failed. After they did their full share and saved for us many months more of war, with many billions more expenditure and $8,000,000,000 collectible foreign debts, we now talk about a national financial calamity in the bonus bill, well knowing hypocrisy is the stock in trade of those who declare it. Every allied country gave a bonus to its soldiers and no calamity ensued. Mr. Mellon's frequent predictions and threats were not hysterical, but were made to frighten Congress and the President. He only succeeded in part.

The influence of Secretary Mellon has been constantly pressed against the soldiers' bonus bill. Rated at $300,000,000 in wealth by Henry K. Klein, it is certain that Mr. Mellon fails to appreciate the plight of 500,000 ex-service men whom American Legion officers informed the committee were out of jobs. Neither would the advice of Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, reflecting the viewpoint of J. P. Morgan or of other international bankers, be sympathetic with any bill to help ex-soldiers. Mr. Mellon and his assistants were constantly on the job denouncing the bonus bill by letters and press statements on every occasion. Their opposition seems to have been successful.

The statement in the veto that the bill comprehended a "service for cash" seems a gratuitous slap to the ex-soldiers and to Congress that felt the bill represented just claims.

No more misleading or unwarranted statement has ever been made in a veto message than that "the bill if enacted into law would place a burden on the American people of between $4,000,000,000 and $5,000,000,000." That sound precisely like the claims by Mellon made before the committee. The report of the Army and Navy witnesses gave a gross cash base of $1,868,750,000, which, "if compounded for 20 years," would reach $4,506,890,000. Mellon gave as a present claim against the Treasury a 20-year compounding of the estimated claim; so does the veto message. In like manner he could estimate the $11,000,000,000 foreign debt now owed this Government at $30,000,000,000 by compounding interest, or more than enough in 20 years, based on Mellon's own estimate of 80 per cent collectible, to pay off the existing national debt of $23,000,000,000.

It is a familiar illustration of methods used to frighten by deceptive estimates that present only half truths. Such statements have no proper place in the veto message. They did not deter any European or Canadian legislative body from paying a bonus to ex-soldiers. They did not prevent an overwhelming vote in House and Senate from recording its convictions. All the power exercised by the administration saved the day only by a margin of four votes in the Senate from overriding the veto.

Secretary Mellon first proposed that we levy special taxes to cover the bonus bill. After the committee had accepted his proposals, the President refused to approve such taxes and threatened a veto if they were added; when the committee then proposed that certificates be issued to meet temporary bonus charges, estimated next year at about $77,000,000 under the bill, the proposal was also summarily rejected. When the committee proposed that the annual interest on the British debt of $4,500,000,000 be used for the payment of the bonus, in no way to affect the principal of the debt, again the proposal was threatened with a veto, and finally the committee received a letter from the President giving a general sales tax as the only alternative for the bill's passage. In other words, all of the people of the country were to be taxed on what they ate, drank, wore, and purchased to meet any soldiers' bonus. The soldiers themselves were to be taxed to pay their own gratuity. The 4,000,000 unemployed, including 500,000 idle soldiers, were to be sales taxed on all they ate, wore, and bought whether they had jobs or not.

The farmers of the country and labor of the country were to be sales taxed the same as Mr. Mellon on the actual food, clothes, and other necessities of life, notwithstanding Mellon is rated at $300,000,000, with an income of $6,000,000 at the modest estimate of 2 per cent, or $20,000 income per day. The farmer and mechanic would in the aggregate contribute probably 80 per cent of the total tax thus to be raised, but do not individually average one five-thousandth part of the Mellon income. The sales tax was unjust, unfair, and was overwhelmingly rejected by both branches of Congress. Many times this session big business has sought to enact a sales tax and has been repudiated by Congress, but the effort to saddle the tax on the soldiers' bonus bill, to give with one hand and take away from them with the other, was a last expiring effort to place this pernicious tax on the people. And that was the only alternative presented to Congress.

This Congress has repealed the excess profits tax, a just tax on large corporate profits collecting $450,000,000 in 1921. Why was not that tax suggested by Mr. Mellon or the Executive to Congress? The reduction in surtax by the present Congress with repeal of luxury taxes would have made a respectable amount if reenacted into law and have paid a large part of the annual $250,000,000 needed to finance the bill, but these proposals were unceremoniously rejected even to pay a soldiers' bonus bill.

With many other proposed methods of financing the soldiers' bonus bill, including the $11,000,000,000 in foreign loan collections that would bring five times the total bonus cost if 80 per cent is collected, every proposal was rejected. The soldiers saved these loans by winning the war. Why are they not justly entitled to a small part of what they saved?

Congress took these soldiers from their jobs without any voice on their part. It sent them to war with $30 a month, or slightly more, on the average. Fifteen dollars of the $30 was deducted for allotments. From $5 to $7 of the balance went for insurance, and then we tried to impress upon these soldiers the needs of the country so that they would give most of the remaining $10 they had left toward Liberty bonds. During that same time we doubled the wages of those who remained in safe home avocations and also incidentally doubled the number of millionaires of the country.

The "service for cash" of the millions who remained home meets no criticism from the Executive, but a reward for sacrifice now is unjustly termed a "service for cash."

I wrote Secretary Mellon March 13, 1922, in effect that if he would glance out of the Treasury windows a half block away down toward the free employment agency on Pennsylvania Avenue he could see white and black ex-service men elbowing each other in this prosperous, wealthy country looking for jobs, however humble. He did not answer this statement and ignored the assertion of Legion officers that 500,000 ex-soldiers were then out of employment.

What sacrifices have Mr. Mellon and others of the President's advisers made who now oppose the bonus bill compared with the average enlisted ex-service man? What about the comparative "service for cash"?

With the condition of the Treasury reported by Secretary Mellon in the veto message, wherein he states that a large part of the debt must be refunded, is it not surprising that in view of his manifect anxiety he has not suggested a reenactment of the excess-profits taxes for corporations or a resumption of the income taxes which he asked to have repealed or of increased inheritance taxes equal to those paid in Great Britain or a reenactment of the luxury taxes or many other methods of aiding the Treasury? Is it not significant that the only method proposed by the administration is the indefensible sales tax, and is it not also significant in the financial statement contained in the veto message that not one word appears regarding the $11,000,000,000 of foreign debts, of which Mr. Mellon declared 80 per cent collectible? The interest on the British loan of $4,500,000,000, reaching over $200,000,000 annually, would cover the bonus charge throughout the 20 years, according to estimates submitted.

Again, is it not surprising that in all the bills passed by Congress to pay railway dividends out of the Federal Treasury and in settlement of war contracts, express or implied, that no taxing feature accompanied any of these bills? Is it not remarkable that although thousands of appropriations have been made in the past by Congress the first instance that a bill should carry its own tax burden was asked by Mr. Mellon on the soldiers' bonus? Will the ship subsidy bonus contain its own method of financing? Time will tell. Is it not significant that practically every big New York business interest that favors a cancellation of foreign debts is opposed to the soldiers' bonus, and is it not equally significant that nearly every proponent of a sales tax, including Kahn, Kuhn, Loeb & Co., Bache, Rothschild, oppose a soldiers' bonus bill?

I regret the President has harkened to these protestants. I wish we could have given our soldiers recognition, even as England, Canada, Australia, France, Italy, and Belgium have given relief to their soldiers, but, whatever the future may bring, we stand convicted as a nation before the world of being the most wealthy Government of all and the most niggardly in recognizing claims of men who had no voice in fixing their own status during the war.

When this bill next comes before Congress, and it will again come, whether its postponement means early campaign contributions or not, the people will approve its passage. They do not approve the effort of vast business interests to saddle a sales tax upon them. They do not approve the efforts of large business interests to cancel our foreign debts, reaching $11,000,000,000, in order to give priority to $5,000,000,000 of private foreign obligations held in this country. They do not approve of a tariff bill that is expected to mulct the American public worse than the Payne-Aldrich bill. They do not approve making the soldiers' bonus bill a political football, whose defeat is stated by the press to be a price for political contributions.

They do believe that this country that preaches patriotism and Americanism in the stock exchanges, chambers of commerce, and other money centers should practice what it preaches and give, even as Canada, Australia, England, France, and Belgium have given, to their ex-soldiers. They believe that the spirit of greed, profiteering, and selfishness that grew up in this country during the war is more dangerous to the prosperity and well-being of the country than all the preaching of un-American Bolshevists.

In that belief the Congress has concurred by a vote of 258 to 54 in the House and 44 to 28 in the Senate. The bonus bill is temporarily blocked, but the American public will never long permit the richest country in the world to fail in its duty to its ex-service men.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, what a glorious roll call is that of America! Only an American can call that glorious roll. From Bunker Hill to Malvern Hill and from Malvern Hill to San Juan Hill there has been such American valor as to keep the kings and emperors and the sultans and the czars and mikados off of us for 140 years. And to Bunker Hill and San Juan Hill there are now other names to add. We have Dead Mans Hill and Hill 204 and the Heights of Verdun and the Meuse-Argonne and the St. Mihiel salient and Grand Pre and Chateau Thierry and Belleau Wood. Three thousand feet from north to south and fifteen hundred feet from end to end and two or three times as high in the middle as this Hall stands Belleau Wood. I had 30 unforgettable days in France and on the ocean with the American Army and the American Navy, and I saw Belleau Wood. I went all over it, from end to end and side to side, and when I got through I was exhausted—and I bore no burden and I fought no foe. But I did encounter the tangled vines and the fallen trees and the German pill boxes and the concrete defenses. Imagine a rock as big as that piano on this platform and another rock about the same size 20 feet away, and a solid wall of concrete connecting the two of them. Imagine such obstructions over here and over there, and over here and over there, all the way up to the top of the wood and down on the other side. And one day a boy came and with his comrades stood at the south end of that wood. And on the day that he came, there crouched behind the fallen trees and the concrete defenses the scientific soldier of the scientific nation of the scientific age of this world—the German soldier—some soldier! And while 6,600 of his comrades laid down their lives there this boy went over the tangled vines and the fallen trees and over the German pill boxes and the concrete defenses and whipped the finest army in the world under the Stars and Stripes! And who was this boy? Why, just bone of your bone, flesh of your flesh, just boy—boy who did not know war—boy who did not want war—just the boy who used to come to you for bread and butter and sugar at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. He did it.

And this is just as good a place as any to say that I was recently taken to task, on a street corner of the city of Chicago, by three fat profiteers, for voting for the soldiers' bonus. They asked me for my reasons, and when I said, "There are a hundred reasons; for example, the pledge," they replied, arrogantly and insolently, "What pledge?" And I said, "Why, do not you know? The pledge that I made under the old trees in the old yard of the old courthouse the day the boys went away—the same pledge made in every courthouse yard and in every camp and in every park in the United States, namely, that we were behind the boys, a hundred and ten million of us; that we would build a bridge of sympathy and support, all the way from Yankee Land to No Man's Land and back again, and that when the boy got back he could have what was left."

And, fellow citizens, you know that was the pledge; you know it, you and you and you. What I want to know is, can a nation live that will repudiate such a pledge, and ought such a nation to live?

About the only objection that I have heard is that the bonus is so small it would be an insult to the soldier boy. Well, when Great Britain needed four thousand millions of dollars she got them from us and stood for the insult. When France wanted three and a half billions of dollars she got them from us and swallowed the insult. Even the dear, good, kind King of Belgium made a fine speech to Congress one day and went home the next day with a $150,000,000 draft in his pocket—just about what the soldiers' bonus would cost us the first year if we insulted the boy with that kind of a thing. And I am in favor of insulting the American boy with a billion if necessary, and I know where to get the money. We will get it from the two nations, Great Britain and France, who this very hour are building ships on the sea and ships under the sea and ships in the air and maintaining this very night vast armies and vast navies with our money. And to the honor and glory of old England be it said that Lloyd-George recently announced a plan to issue bonds to the extent of £944,000,000 sterling to pay to America the four thousand million dollars which Great Britain owes to America, and a commission of Frenchmen has just announced that the credit of France is good and that she will yet pay all.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, this bill as the conferees have presented it to us is not, in my opinion, all that it should be. There are a number of provisions in it which might be improved. The bill, in my opinion, was a much better measure when it went to the Senate from the House than it is as it emerges from the conference. And yet we must accept these compromises, even these rather violent jolts in some cases, with good grace, and secure the best results we can in view of the existing differences of opinion.

I think it is very unfortunate that the land-settlement provision went out of the bill. It was the one constructive provision which the bill contained. It was the one provision that in the running of the years would have given the veterans a safe and secure anchor to the land and would have aided greatly in the development of the country. That provision is out of the bill because the Senate did not see fit to accept the sound reclamation provision of the House bill and inserted a provision so different that the change afforded the conferees an opportunity to eliminate all reclamation and land-settlement features.

I can not agree with those who believe that the House failed in its duty in that it did not make provision in the bill for the payment of the obligations under it. We legislate frequently in a way to lay heavy obligations on the Federal Treasury without accompanying such legislation with any provision for the raising of revenue. In fact, it is very unusual in our legislation to make special provision for meeting the obligations which the legislation entails. It would be a departure from our ordinary procedure to do that. Furthermore, so far as the obligations under this bill in the immediate future are concerned, they can be met out of the current revenues of the Government without, I trust, creating a deficit.

They will be no greater for the next year or two than the obligations under other legislation that has been placed upon the statute books in the recent past. And as we expect when necessary to make provision to meet other obligations, so we shall in due time make provision to meet the obligations which this bill will lay upon the country and upon the Treasury.

In my opinion, we are rather belated in legislating for the ex-service men as we are proposing to do it in this bill. We are not wholly fulfilling our obligation to them. We are not fully meeting their expectation, but we are doing the best that it is possible to do under the circumstances and in view of the wide differences of opinion that exist touching the matter. I believe the bill if it becomes a law, as I hope it will, will go very far indeed toward expressing to the men who took up arms in defense of their country the continued appreciation of their countrymen. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman from New York use some of his time?

Mr. CAREW. I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am not in such a cheerful frame of mind as the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] apparently is with respect to the elimination of the reclamation and soldier settlement provisions from this bill. My feelings are outraged at the wrong that has been done. I am convinced that if the conferees had sincerely desired to reach an agreement upon Title VIII containing the land-settlement provisions they could have done so without difficulty. The only reason that there was no such agreement is because a majority of the members of this conference committee are not in favor of the reclamation of waste lands. The two Houses have expressed their approval of the enactment of legislation providing for the creation of farms and homes for returned soldiers. It would have been perfectly easy for the friends of a national reclamation policy to reconcile the differences between the House and the Senate, but this most beneficent legislation fell into the hands of its enemies, and in cold blood they killed it. The plain and absolute truth is that the conferees made no honest effort to reach an agreement.

That both the Senate and the House are in favor of the reclamation of waste lands to provide homes for veterans of the late war is clearly demonstrated by an examination of this bill. Both bodies have provided the means whereby that entirely worthy object can be accomplished, the only differences being in mere details. Certainly it would not be difficult for the conferees to determine whether the work of reclaiming arid and swamp lands is to be carried on by a board of five members, of which one is to be the Secretary of the Interior, or whether the Secretary alone should have complete supervision of the undertaking. The Senate amendment provides that the Federal Government shall deal only with legally organized irrigation and drainage districts, while the House bill provides that contracts may be made with such districts. Conferees earnestly seeking to obtain results would not have taken long to reconcile the differences between the two Houses on this question.

Neither the House bill nor the Senate amendment carried any specific amount of money for the construction of reclamation projects. The Senate amendment limited the total sum to be appropriated for this purpose to $350,000,000, while there was no limitation fixed by the House. In each case the amounts actually expended would be fixed by appropriations hereafter made by Congress based on estimates submitted through the Budget. The House and the Senate also agreed that the Government should be reimbursed for the cost of reclaiming lands except that the House bill allowed credit to veterans to the extent of their adjusted-service pay, while the Senate amendment provided that the Government should be fully reimbursed for all expenditures made. Will anyone dare to say that a conference committee honestly in favor of the reclamation of waste lands could not have compromised these slight differences with the result that legislation could have been enacted as a part of this bill which would have carried out the plain intent and purpose of both the Senate and the House?

Gentlemen say to-day that because the Senate amendment merely provided that soldiers should have a preference right of entry, therefore, it was not a soldiers' settlement bill, and yet at the opening of every reclamation project since the close of the war there have been 10 soldiers asking for farms where one was to be found. If a 60 days' preference right had been given it is absolutely certain that none but ex-soldiers would have obtained the farms. Experience has demonstrated that fact beyond question. And can anyone doubt that this, a disagreement on the subject of solider preference, could not have been easily reconciled by the conferees if their hearts were in their work?

The undoubted truth is that in violation of the trust imposed in them they followed their private inclinations rather than the will of the two Houses, and that is not my concept of the duty of conferees. When the House, after due deliberation, after mature consideration, adopts a soldier settlement plan, and when the Senate amends the bill in terms designed to accomplish that same policy and then the bill goes to conference, certainly in good faith, in fairness to the two Houses, in justice to the majority in each body who voted in favor of this legislation, the committee of conference should have at least made an effort at compromise and agreement.

Let it not be forgotten that land settlement was one part of the fivefold plan recommended and requested by the American Legion, the organization of veterans, which is primarily responsible for the passage of this bill. The American Legion at its national conventions has repeatedly indorsed the idea of providing homes for ex-service men by reclaiming arid and swamp lands, and has as strongly insisted upon this as any other of the five options whereby those who served the Nation in the late war were to have their compensation adjusted. The conferees on this bill, however, have totally and contemptuously ignored this request.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Speaking for myself and myself alone, I adopted the course which I thought would be most likely to bring to the veterans the compensation which has so long been denied them. [Applause.]

Mr. HAYDEN. The veterans have always asked for five forms of compensation and advocated each one of them with equal earnestness. The best form of compensation, the greatest benefit that can be conferred by this Government on any American who patriotically served his country in time of war is to provide him with a farm with a home upon the land. In my judgment the land settlement and reclamation feature was the only constructive part of this bill. The other provisions mean nothing except that taxes must be levied or revenue raised in some way to pay cash now or in the future to the returned soldiers, sailors, and marines. Under the land settlement or reclamation provisions Congress could have made possible the reclamation of waste lands, which would continually increase in value. It would have been an enduring and most profitable investment. Homes and farms would be created and a permanent market made for the products of American factories. If the conferees had only tried, if they had only taken advantage of their opportunity, if they had only done their plain duty, they could have placed in this bill a reclamation provision which would have added enough wealth to this Nation to have many times more than equaled the total cost of the soldiers' bonus.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that a majority of the conferees on this bill did not carry out the will of the House and the Senate. They did not follow their instructions. They did not act in good faith. They did not make an honest effort to do what both bodies desired, and that was to report back legislation which would have provided homes and farms for veterans by the reclamation of waste lands. [Applause.]

Mr. CAREW. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to proceed out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks and to proceed out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I have frequent inquiries as to what the facts are of record with reference to the progressive rate of interest law and the policy of deflation of which that law was a part and who is responsible therefor. In the short time allotted me it will be impossible, of course, to read all of these records, but I shall in my extension of remarks make citations to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, so there can be no question as to the facts, even though there may be different conclusions based thereon.

In the fall of 1919, after the Republicans had gained control of both branches of Congress, the leaders of that party in both the House of Representatives and the United States Senate raised the cry that the Democratic administration had inflated the currency and that something should be done toward deflation. The Republicans in the House put forth one of their ablest men, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], a member of the Banking and Currency Commitee, and all will recall the speech he made at that time, in which he charged that the Democratic administration had inflated the currency, that it had put the country on a "greenback" basis, specifically charging that two billions of the Federal reserve notes in circulation were nothing more than fiat money. I interrupted the gentleman at the time and challenged the gentleman to show wherein we had been guilty of inflation by the issuance of fiat money. In response to my challenge, he cited the number of Federal reserve notes outstanding and the amount of gold reserve against them. He also stated at that time specifically that there was nothing that could be done by legislation unless it be to raise the discount rate further, and it was evident from his remarks that the Republican Party had decided upon a deflation policy and intended to force a raise in the discount rate and bring political pressure to bear on the Federal Reserve Board to put in effect a drastic policy of deflation. By reference to the RECORD it will be seen that the Republican Members of the House repeatedly applauded the gentleman from Massachusetts, and at that time not one single Republican Member of Congress joined me and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON], also a member of the committee, in our protest. Some Republicans, who were so vociferous in their applause then, are now, after they see the evil effect of the deflation policy, denouncing what they applauded then. The report of Mr. LUCE's speech can be found at page 2200 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the second session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, dated January 29, 1920.

The speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts was the first public notice of the deflation policy that the Republican Congress was urging the Federal Reserve Board to put into effect. Prior to that time Governor Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, had appeared before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, at which time the same Republican gentlemen insisted that the currency be deflated, and Governor Harding intimated the plan was to deflate along certain lines. I and one other Democratic member of the committee sounded a note of warning and specifically directed attention to the fact that the only inflation that existed of which there was any danger grew out of the speculative frenzy that was then being indulged in in New York City, financed indirectly, we feared, by the Federal reserve bank of that city. In the Senate Mr. OWEN, a Democrat, protested, while, upon the other hand, in that body, Senator MCCORMICK, of Illinois, in behalf of the Republican Party, continued the pressure and introduced his famous deflation resolution calling on the Federal Reser Board to advise the Senate what steps were being taken and were to be taken to deflate the currency. By reference to the RECORD of February 16, May 15, May 17, and May 18, 1920, the facts of record in the Senate can be read.

The bill authorizing the Federal Reserve Board to establish progressive rates of discount passed both Houses practically unanimously for reasons which I shall give, and if I make any mistake I challenge my good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], the Republican chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, to rise in his seat and correct me.

The reasons were that Governor Harding had come before our committee and represented that it was necessary to give the board this authority in order to check the speculation and inflation of credits in New York City. We were led to believe that the sole object of the proposed progressive rate of discount law was to check the New York Federal Reserve Bank, and when those of us from the agricultural States suggested the ruin that might ensue to the farmers of the South and West if high rates were charged in that section, Governor Harding assured us that his object was to check speculative credits in New York and conserve legitimate credits for the moving of the coming crop. By reference to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 31, 1920, it will be seen that the Republican chairman of the committee discussed the bill at length in presenting it to the House and called attention to the fact that there was a good deal of speculation in the big cities. He specifically said that a good deal of the excessive borrowings were doubtless used for financing speculation or for new ventures that were of doubtful economic value.

By reading the debate that day it will be seen that gentlemen from New York and Chicago protested against what they alleged this policy was aimed at then, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON], in answer to their protest, called attention to the fact that there was at that time borrowed from the Federal Reserve Bank of New York $3,454,000,000 of the total of $6,241,000,000 borrowed of all the Federal reserve banks in the United States. In other words, the entire debate discloses that the House understood the progressive rate of discount was necessary and was to be used only to check the wild speculation in New York which threatened to absorb available credits that would be much needed for agricultural and legitimate activities. That reason, and that alone, put the bill through the House of Representatives.

It is interesting to know that in the debate on that date Mr. McKeown, a Democrat from Oklahoma, specifically raised the question of application of the policy and was assured that the making of this progressive interest rule to apply to banks in the stock-speculation districts, where they speculate in stocks, would not be used to impair the borrowing capacity of the agricultural communities. Mr. LUCE, of Massachusetts, the Republican leader in the deflation policy, in that debate stated that the greatest orgy of gambling that the world had ever known was in progress and that the Federal reserve system had been resorted to for speculation by stock gamblers. Mr. Platt, the Republican chairman in charge of the bill, on page 5067 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 31, 1920, drew the applause of the House when he stated:

> We are trying to prevent the big banks from hogging all the credit and not letting the little banks have any.

I repeat that it was under these representations that Congress enacted the progressive rate of interest law which was the basis of the policy of deflation put into effect by the Republican Congress through Governor Harding. The present rate of interest instead of being applied for the purpose of stopping the speculation in New York City, was used to deflate the farmers in the wheat and cotton belt.

Read these records and it will be apparent to all that the policy of deflation was brought out by political pressure of a Republican Congress, and some of the same Republicans who now seek to leave the impression that Democrats were responsible were the ones who at that time applauded their leader when they charged the Democrats with inflation. In other words, these Republican politicians have shifted their positions and are now denouncing what they applauded then.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I desire to congratulate the conference committee on eliminating from the adjusted compensation or so-called soldiers' bonus bill which we will pass to-day the general land-reclamation feature.

The elimination of this feature will save to the taxpayers of the United States anywhere from $350,000,000 to $1,000,000,000. The elimination of the land-reclamation scheme will also take from the soldiers who fought in the late war the opprobrium of having it said that about a billion dollars of ultimate expenditure was caused by their reception of the bonus when it really belongs to land reclamation. I have nothing against a land-reclamation scheme, but it should be considered and passed on its merits and not made a part of the soldiers' bonus. In congratulating the committee on the final passage of the bill, which will take place to-day, I desire especially to congratulate them on eliminating this land-scheme method of disposing of funds under the bonus. [Applause.]

On Monday, February 28, 1922, on the floor of this House I specifically opposed the land-reclamation scheme as a part of the bonus bill on the ground that it would increase our burden of bureaucratic government and add in permanence enormous sums to our tax burdens. If we need land reclamation, let us adopt it as a separate measure.

The report of the House members of the conference committee states:

> The House recedes with an amendment striking out the new provisions proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment. The effect of the agreement is that the bill contains neither a veterans' land settlement nor a general reclamation feature.

I desire especially to congratulate the gentlemen who signed this report, Messrs. FORDNEY, GREEN, and LONGWORTH, on this improvement in the bonus bill.

One of the things I was especially sent to Congress for was to help pass a good bonus bill. To-day's action, I feel confident, will be our finishing touch on the measure, and I hope I shall soon be able to report to my constituents that it is a law. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROSSDALE].

Mr. CAREW. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York also.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SANDERS of Indiana). The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak out of order in relation to the resolution I am introducing to-day asking for an investigation of the United States Veterans' Hospital No. 81, situated in my congressional district. I live just a few minutes' walk from where the hospital is located and am quite familiar with the affairs of this institution. For several months the people of my locality have been hearing reports reflecting upon the management of this soldiers' hospital, including stories of brutalities that have been practiced on patients there. Recently the conditions became so intolerable that something had to be done to protect those patients.

As you gentlemen have been reading in the newspapers, I made a personal investigation of the conditions there, including the stories of assaults being committed upon patients. There was a case of a soldier veteran of the Spanish War, the Boxer rebellion, and of the World War, Nicholas Samson, who was almost murderously assaulted by two attendants; his ribs crushed, his wrist broken, and his eyes blackened, which brought the matter to a climax. When I met the head of the institution and asked him how it happened, he said he did not know and admitted that it was 12 hours before he was even aware that the assault had been committed. Four days later he suspended the attendants upon instructions from the district manager of the Veterans' Bureau, who had received a complaint from the commander of the American Legion. It was evident that if there had been no public complaint made it would have been merely a ward incident. I doubt very much whether anything would have been done to the two attendants that committed the assault if the thing had not gotten into the newspapers. When I quizzed Colonel Chronquest, who is in charge of the hospital, as to how this thing happened, he put forward the theory that it was possible to strike a man in a certain part of his face and have both eyes simultaneously blackened, although he later admitted that he felt certain the attendants had beaten up the patient and were at fault.

Mr. KINDRED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSSDALE. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KINDRED. Did the medical superintendent of hospital 81 referred to make any report whatever of the assault on the insane patient by which his ribs were broken and these injuries committed?

Mr. ROSSDALE. He did practically nothing, and explained his lack of action with the lame excuse that he was investigating the affair; but the facts are that he made no complaint at all until the public stepped in and the attendants were ordered arrested. The ward nurse upheld the attendants, and it later developed at the inquiry that in that chamber of horrors known as G ward, which is a building more than a block away from the main building where are confined half a hundred insane patients, many of them raving lunatics, there is no doctor on duty at night. In the entire establishment there are only eight doctors, although there are many more employees in the hospital than there are patients.

In the extensive offices of the hospital one sees numerous clerks and stenographers busily employed in caring for the endless petty details made necessary by the extreme institutionalism prevalent there. The following illustration will give an insight how far the thing is carried. Patients admittedly sane must deposit whatever money they have at the hospital office upon admission, and thereafter if they want to spend even a nickel they must go through the stupid rigmarole of drawing a voucher and a check is then given them for 5 cents.

I inquired of the doughty colonel in charge if he did not think more than 8 doctors were required to take care of 340 patients, including an additional 200 outdoor patients who are supposed to call periodically for treatment, and he replied that 8 doctors were enough. It is clearly apparent that the hospital is long on clerks but short on doctors. In every hospital I had ever visited doctors were generally much in evidence; in this hospital the important feature seems to be the office, with its large clerical and attendant staff.

Of the eight doctors in the institution seven are assigned to day duty and one at night; the single night doctor also acts as an executive during the night. Often it is that a patient's condition grows worse during the night and medical attention becomes urgently necessary. God help the poor unfortunates in that hospital who require a doctor's care and attention, for no doctor is likely to minister to them until after the breakfast call shall have been sounded.

The hospital is located upon a 36-acre tract with several buildings a considerable distance apart from each other. In an emergency case no medical help could be had. Statements made by patients to me indicate that it is better for patients not to complain to Colonel Chronquest of lack of medical attention lest they care to hazard the risk of being discharged as cured, thereby losing both hospitalization and compensation.

The sad case of the terrible beating of Nicholas Samson is not the only cruelty story, for there are reports of a number of other patients who have been beaten by attendants. A patient named George Fowler came to my office, stating that he had escaped from the hospital at night and walked the streets all night long awaiting the opportunity to inform me of a brutal beating he had seen an attendant give a weak and very sick patient named Golding, who weighs only 80 pounds. Golding had been ordered to bed and refused to go, whereby the attendant beat and shook him and then threw him upon the bed and tied the unfortunate man to the bed.

It is a natural sequence that attendants and orderlies will become hard boiled if the officials in charge of the hospital shut their eyes to instances of brutality and rough treatment of patients. It is no secret that orderlies were encouraged to carry wet towels to strike troublesome patients with—wet towels hurt, but leave no marks upon the bodies of patients.

That it was the policy to "treat them rough, if you think it necessary," is seen by the affidavit of a former attendant named James A. Dunn, and of a former patient named Samuel Ury, in which it is related by them that the assistant head of the institution had instructed these attendants that if a man got unruly they should use force if necessary; that if one man was not enough to use ten.

I, James A. Dunn, duly sworn, depose and state that I reside at 87 South Tenth Street, Brooklyn, New York City and State of New York. That I was employed as an attendant assigned in charge of patients' clothing room at the United States Veterans' Hospital No. 81, Sedgwick Avenue and Kingsbridge Road, Bronx, from May 26 to August 14, 1922, inclusive.

That on or about June 25 I was notified to attend a meeting of attendants in reception room of ward C 30. While at this meeting Doctor Brewster, in a talk to the attendants, told them that if any patients became nasty, ugly, or violent, they were to use force, and if one man was not enough to call in as many as he needed, even ten men if necessary, and to go the limit, and he would stand back of them if any trouble should ever arise as a result.

COPY OF AFFIDAVIT OF SAMUEL URY.

STATE OF NEW YORK,
County of New York, ss:

I, Samuel Ury, duly sworn, depose and state that I reside at 323 Beekman Avenue, Borough of the Bronx, City and State of New York. That I was an inmate of United States Hospital No. 81, Sedgwick and Kingsbridge Road, from June 1, 1922, to July 18, 1922, inclusive. I am now a patient at United States Naval Hospital, Brooklyn, N. Y., for chronic gastritis.

While I was a patient at the hospital, on or about three days previous to Doctor Chronquest assuming command of the hospital, while Doctor Brewster was clinical director and practically in actual command of the hospital, he called a meeting of the attendants in the reception room of ward C 30. At that time several patients were sitting around the reception room. Doctor Brewster politely requested inmates to leave the reception room for 10 or 15 minutes. I, with several other inmates, one Thomas Scott, one Frank Lyons, and John Martin, immediately went into the next room, which is divided from the reception room by rolling doors. While there I distinctly heard Doctor Brewster tell his audience, consisting of attendants, that in the future should any patients give any trouble whatsoever they can use violence if they think it necessary, and that he, Doctor Brewster, would back them up to the fullest extent. This was also overheard by my comrades as stated above. We discussed this matter among ourselves and decided that should we comment publicly it would result in having us punished by transfer to ward G, dreaded by all inmates.

(Certificate filed in New York County, No. 420.)

It is not a pleasant subject to discuss on the floor of this House, and I question whether such a condition of affairs can be permitted to continue much longer. The institution is run in a near-military style, even with censorship of the mails. A patient can not leave the grounds without a signed written parole. He may be just as sane as you or I, but it does not make any difference; if he is a patient and wants liberty of the ward to get the air on the grounds, a parole card, duly signed and attested, is absolutely necessary.

It is difficult to adequately describe this nuisance hospital. An article published in the New York Times on September 12 gives a description of the experiences of a former patient there, named Roscoe Conkling Hatch, who writes to the Times as follows, alleging certain "deplorable conditions," especially in the receiving or observation ward, through which all patients must pass:

The equipment by electricity, etc., seems admirable. Some of the nurses are gentlewomen and some of the doctors are all that could be desired, but I shall warn all men against "81."

In his letter Mr. Hatch pays tribute to the great kindness he received from doctors, nurses, and orderlies in ward B40. As to conditions elsewhere in the institution he says:

Upon entrance to the hospital all clothing and effects are removed and the patient given a bath robe. He is then locked within this ward, and all who enter or leave, doctors or nurses or patients, are admitted and leave with a key. The period before seeing a doctor varies; I waited four days myself. No move is made to ascertain whether the patient admitted has contagious disease, trouble with heart or lungs. Undoubtedly, the "observation" period is wise, but there should be some physical examination for the protection of other patients.

The method of observation is rather subtle, but I noticed one or two obvious instances of it: An orderly came into the smoking room where we congregated, deliberately lifted three or four books and as deliberately let them fall with a bang, perhaps to see which patients jumped! The locked door, the supercilious attitude of the nurses, and impertinence of some doctors, whose questions range anywhere from whether "if 2 and 2 make 5, what would you do if a cat fell in a river?" to asking you "if your relations with your family are congenial and moral," indicate the attitude to be: This man is insane and degenerate; I will prove it.

It is my opinion that some of these young students would not be concerned if they proved their cases insane. If I was asked once I had a total of 10 questions from at least three doctors reiterating: "Do you think you are going insane?" or "How can you be sure you are not now or will not later be insane?" Though I treated the questions lightly I reasoned if I were near the brink of losing my mind each reiteration might conceivably raise the doubt in my mind which would probably push me across the border, whereas different encouraging treatment would produce the desirable (from my standpoint) condition.

The food in this ward was much below that I received after I left it. I could not eat anything but potatoes and bread and butter and milk, when I could get it. I am bound to state that after I left there it was better, but it was there that I was served once with an egg which had passed beyond a welcome from polite society, and also fish which made me ill—like the slums of some city, famous through Kipling, it "smelled to heaven."

SAYS MAIL IS CENSORED.

Another thing was annoying; while in the "observation" ward a patient's mail is censored. I presumed this was like censorship in France to guard against "giving comfort to the enemy"; in other words, to prevent demented or crabbed patients giving unwarranted criticism of the hospital management or equipment to the public. With each letter went forth from Mr. Chronquest, who is in charge, but whom I have never seen, a very pleasant letter telling the recipient that the hospital authorities were interested in this particular patient especially, and in all service men, and went on to say that constructive suggestions for his benefit would be welcomed. Very good in intention, though I believe it is only superficial. It is mortifying to discover that this same stereotyped letter accompanies even business letters to people to whom you certainly would not turn in personal matters, say, to whom you sent money for a bill due. As the doctor there reads all the letters, a little discrimination would not seem amiss.

For a hospital for nervous diseases this is as noisy as it could be made. All doors slam or are slammed, and the vacuum cleaner and floor polisher are nerve racking in the extreme. During the conference which I had with a doctor, he was so much disturbed, though in a different room, that he went out and harshly reprimanded an orderly. The orderly was in no wise to blame, merely carrying out his orders.

If this was hard on a doctor in good health, who presumably had good food and was not subjected to any of the indignities of patients, what is it to men who go for "rest and treatment"? While in this ward I could not sleep, but only once was I given a sleeping medicine, and, too, the terrible cries of patients in "G" building, where the violent and insane are incarcerated, robbed me of any desire for sleep. When I told the doctor he said, "Oh, you'll get used to it; it's like a nurse learning to let a baby cry."

HEARS CRIES OF PAIN.

I was also told the patients had been on a drunk. Rather, to my mind, it was the orderlies; perhaps patients under lock and key could get liquor; I do not know. In exact words, what I heard was this, uttered in the most terrifying screaming: "Stop! Stop! That's my arm! You're killing me! Cut it out! Cut it out!" And then moaning which again rose to screaming. This came after a period of absolute silence. I was not awakened and I certainly did not sleep later. Of course, any complaint I made was treated as though I were a child or else demented.

The whole method seems backward. Is it the aim of the authority in the hospital to win back men to mental health or to rob them of what they have? Placed in the worst ward, if they pass the test of its discipline they may be removed to a better. But during this period much is wrong; attitude of personnel, imprisonment, lack of medical attention of doctors or nurses, censorship of mail, ridiculous tests of observation, the questions of examining physicians, which many patients, with contempt in their mind, answer absurdly, thus perhaps prejudicing their case and certainly not tending to confidence; the apparent conviction on the part of some of those internes and doctors that the patient is mentally unsound; the poor food, the noise; and, finally, it is my conviction that the men who (there may be some disease cases not due to service) through services to their country under hazardous circumstances have paid for their heroism with loss of mind are undoubtedly ill treated at times. All these facts lead me to feel that the method and administration are at fault. The present head, Mr. Chronquest, has so cut down the personnel that the hospital is not properly manned. I believe there is one nurse to about every 60 patients, and two orderlies can scarcely be sufficient.

While making a personal investigation of the hospital I insisted upon being shown through the dreaded ward G. I found a case of one poor fellow who had too insistently demanded his mail and was therefore sentenced there for eight days and had been three weeks in ward G, which is the building to which I previously referred to as the chamber of horrors, and that is actually what it amounts to. Why are sane men confined there? Of course, it is indefensible, but Colonel Chronquest replies that he thinks they may be on the border line and therefore, in his opinion, eligible. As I passed the ward in company with Doctor Bunker, the physician in charge that day, I heard a patient say, "Doctor, Doctor, won't you please let me out of here. I did not do anything but ask for my mail." I said to the doctor, "What is the trouble with that man? Is that man insane?" He said, "Oh, no; he is sane." I said, "What is his trouble?" He said, "Mild neurasthenia." I said, "Doctor, do you think you are going to cure men of nervous trouble by putting them in a ward with a lot of raving lunatics?" He expressed his medical opinion that it would not harm the patients. I asked the head of the institution, Doctor Chronquest, if he thought that the sentencing of patients—slightly nervous cases, men with mild nervous diseases—to a madhouse would contribute to the cure, and he took refuge behind the statement that everybody in the institution was potentially insane. It is my opinion that he himself is insane; that he is suffering from institutional insanity, which, I am told by medical men, is a form of insanity sometimes acquired by persons who are long around the insane and have charge of them.

They become imbued with the idea that the institution is above everything, and have a mania for institutionalizing everything and everybody about them. I found upon examination into affairs there that veteran patients are denied all creature comforts which various auxiliary organizations, such as the various welfare workers, including Knights of Columbus and the War Mothers, furnish to patients. The organizations that distribute creature comforts to hospital patients are not permitted to carry on their work at this institution, but if they desire they may send things to the management once a month, and the management will distribute them as they see fit. There were veteran auxiliary organizations that distributed sweaters, socks, handkerchiefs, toothbrushes, and all the little things that lighten and brighten hospital life, but they were ordered away by this hospital autocrat. The theater owners in New York permit sick veterans to enter the theaters free of charge. The hospital management shut down on this also. Because one soldier took another in violation of the rules to a play without consent of the officer of the day, who was in charge, the hospital board of discipline, consisting of four hospital bureaucrats, gave him a hearing, and although sane he was nevertheless sentenced to the chamber of horrors, in that ward where the severe and the acute insane persons are confined. This discipline for petty infraction of the hospital rules is explained and defended by Colonel Chronquest as being diagnostic as well as disciplinary. I could go on for hours and recite to you the indignities and the tortures suffered by the patients in that place, but time does not permit.

I wired Colonel Forbes, Director of the Veterans' Bureau, demanding an investigation, and upon request of his representative filed the following statement of conditions existing at United States Veterans' Hospital No. 81:

COMPLAINTS.

1. That an assault upon a physically weak and helpless inmate of ward 6, suffering from paresis, by name of Nicholas Samson, was made by two attendants, which resulted in crushed ribs, a broken wrist, and both eyes severely blackened. That these two attendants were not suspended from duty by the authorities in charge the moment they learned of this almost murderous assault.

That these two attendants were permitted to continue in employ as attendants for three days after the assault and were suspended only after a public complaint had been made by the commander of the American Legion to Major Lent, in charge of the Veterans' Bureau, District No. 2, and that only thereafter were they suspended and ordered to be arrested.

2. That patients with slight nervous disorders, neurasthenia, and mild nervous cases, including such as are termed "border-line cases" and not definitely insane, are frequently disciplined by confinement in ward G, which is a building wherein are housed violent and actually insane men. That these patients are confined thus for periods by a disciplinary board as a means of discipline (punishment) for petty infractions of hospital rules, such as deportment, etc. That the mental anguish and horror of patients sentenced to such confinement among dangerous lunatics endangers them and, instead of effecting cures, is likely to retard their recovery and possibly bring about actual acute insanity.

3. That patients are discharged from the hospital when not cured and refused information of their discharge status by the hospital management, notice of discharge given being merely a verbal statement by a ward nurse. That patients are thus turned loose and left helpless and can only learn their discharge status either by lengthy correspondence or repeated calls at the Veterans' Bureau in Manhattan.

4. That patients of the hospital requesting medical treatment often find it difficult to receive it or to receive ordinary medicines. That patients requiring special food for physical ailments, such as stomach trouble, have difficulty in receiving it and are compelled to subsist upon the regular food, even though they are unable to partake of it due to their stomach trouble, etc. That little or no attention is paid to complaints of patients and that patients have been beaten and roughly treated by attendants.

5. That there is lacking entertainment or recreational features such as are requisite to brighten hospital life and which should be a part of the treatment for patients suffering with nervous disorders. That auxiliary veteran agencies have been discouraged from supplying the patients with the little necessities which they require that attends to their comforts and lightens life in the hospital.

6. That the hospital is largely conducted by bureaucratic methods resulting in severe and rigorous near military management.

I suggest that this investigation be designed as preventive rather than punitive, with the aim in view of improving the conditions, correcting and remedying them, in order that the ex-soldier wards of the Nation may have hospitalization such as the Congress of the United States intended and for which they enacted legislation and appropriated almost unlimited funds.

I also suggest that the investigation committee publicly assure employees of the hospital that no retroactive measures will be taken resulting in later demotion or dismissal because of testimony given by them, and that patients be assured that testimony given by them will not result in later discharge from the hospital because of same, with its accompanying loss of compensation.

He appointed a committee to investigate these complaints I had filed and then used all the power of the immense machinery of the Veterans' Bureau to prevent the investigation from being anything else than a mantle to clothe the facts and hide the shameful administration of that hospital.

The story of a former patient whose affidavit is herewith printed appeared in the newspapers and, presto, the bureau wired him to call. The following is a copy of the telegram sent him and which he promptly ignored and turned over to me:

[Copy of telegram.]

FEDERAL BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION, DIVISION OF REHABILITATION,
September 8, 1922.

SAMUEL URY,
323 Beekman Avenue, Bronx, New York:

You are requested to call by phone, at once, Doctor Robinson, at United States Veterans' Bureau.

LENT.

(Confirmation.)

How many others they actually intimidated I do not know. I tried to go on with it nevertheless, but found it impossible to continue to participate in such an investigation and withdrew. I am convinced that no bureau-conducted investigation will end the unhappy combination of institutional bureaucracy and near-military régime that prevails there.

My brief experience with the committee, arranged for by Colonel Forbes, to investigate these conditions convinced me that the Veterans' Bureau officials would not, if they could avoid it, conduct an investigation of the hospital that would disclose anything reflecting upon their own management, and therefore embarrassing to their own bureau.

Without prejudice to the inquiry now in progress there, it is plainly evident to me that the situation requires an investigation of a broader and wider scope than the one arranged for by Colonel Forbes. That it is necessary to have access to hospital records, that medical opinion be secured not in the employ of the bureau, including investigators to sift out details and facts, and that the committee have power of subpœna, and so forth.

A congressional investigation will throw light upon the conditions prevailing in that and in other veterans' hospitals throughout the country where charges of cruelty and mistreatment are being made, and action by Congress will inevitably result in remedying them.

I believe it is incumbent upon Members of Congress to investigate that hospital and all Veterans' Bureau hospitals where serious complaints have been lodged against their management, for only an adequate investigation such as Congress can provide will end these abuses.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD in connection with my speech upon House Resolution 431, providing for a congressional investigation of conditions prevailing at United States Veterans' Hospital No. 81, situated in my congressional district. It was not possible in the time allotted to me for that speech to give to the Members of this House a statement adequately describing the harsh bureaucratic institutionalism prevailing at this hospital which Congress intended should be a place of cure and care for veterans of the World War afflicted with or suffering from war neurosis.

As I then stated to the House mistreatment, and beatings of soldier patients and the exposure of the extreme institutionalism prevalent there aroused public indignation. In response to the demands of the American Legion and of an indignant public in my city I demanded of Director Forbes, of the Veterans' Bureau, a prompt investigation of the administration of the affairs of the hospital. He promised—through his representatives in New York—to appoint an investigation committee of three, to consist of two of his subordinates and one outsider, all named by himself. I was given verbal assurances that this investigation would be open, impartial, and thorough.

Congressman, give us a chance to look into and sift things, and if there is anything wrong we will show it up and remedy it—

Said Director Forbes's representative to me, and I therefore consented to participate in the investigation.

The investigation had not proceeded very far when it became clearly apparent that this bureau-conducted investigation of itself not only had no intention of letting out anything that reflected upon their management of this hospital but that it was using all of its tremendous influence and power to cover up every embarrassing incident and circumstance.

They staged farcical, open hearings for a few days, all the while calling only unimportant or wherever possible favorable witnesses. They ignored and failed to send for unfriendly witnesses or those whose stories reflecting upon the management appeared in the press. Very skillfully they persuaded or secretly intimidated former patients and employees from coming forward to tell their stories of abuses.

The following is an illustration of the setting by which they staged open hearings for a few days before the committee went into executive or secret session. The entire place was cleaned up and orders given to "doll up" and give the institution a holiday appearance. A sight-seeing automobile car which some one had given as a present to the hospital when it was first opened up and which was left to rust on the grounds under the blue sky without a shed and which had never given a ride to a single veteran was now cleaned and tuned up and kept circling around the grounds to convey an impression of tender solicitude for the soldier patients. The humor of it appealed to the patients; even the acutely insane in the dreaded G building looking out through the barred windows of that chamber of horrors laughed and joked about it.

All patients suspected of having or intending to make complaints were either locked up in the ward for violents—G building—where they were inaccessible or else given temporary paroles, sending them away for the period of the investigation. Employees in whom confidence was lacking were given short leaves of absence and also gotten out of the way. Telephone and mail censorship of the patients was tightened up enough to make any of the late kaiser's army officers green with envy had they been able to have known of it during the war.

To the spectators the few open hearings seemingly were pleasant affairs. Excellent noon-day lunches were provided for everybody present. Fresh cut flowers in glass vases graced tables covered with spotless linen, and friendly hospitality was in the very air. Col. A. P. Chronquest pleasantly announced that the luncheon was the regular mess of officials, employees, and patients. A later inquiry by me elicited the following reply from a group of patients:

Cut flowers—why, we have never seen a napkin or even cut soup greens since we are here.

However, it was intended to create and convey an impression to the spectators, although any discerning persons could see through it and readily grasp its purpose. Excepting myself, who seemed a discordant note in this tuneful affair, there was only a piano accompaniment lacking and the investigating committee singing some old refrain like Sweet Adeline to have made the hearings mere pleasant social functions.

The few open hearings at the hospital were followed by an announcement of executive sessions at the Veterans' Bureau offices miles away from the hospital. How many secret sessions the committee held is not told. I have been unable to ascertain whether the committee has finally concluded the farce and was now pondering over the testimony or whether they have reported their findings to Director Forbes.

It looked as if the thing was being quietly pigeonholed and left to die, and so I sent Director Forbes the following telegram:

SEPTEMBER 26, 1922.

Col. C. R. FORBES,
Director Veterans' Bureau,
Washington, D. C.

I received no reply to my written request to you to give me a copy of the minutes of the investigation you are conducting of your management of Veterans' Hospital No. 81 and insist upon being furnished such copy of minutes. A spirit of fairness ought to prompt you to provide same on request. You promised the people of New York that this investigation would be open and public. Why did you later make it secret? Will you inform me whether this investigation has been concluded; and, if so, of its findings?

ALBERT B. ROSSDALE, M. C.

The following is his telegram in reply:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 26, 1922.

Congressman ALBERT B. ROSSDALE.

I have not yet received official report of investigation Bronx Hospital. Will consider your request when report is received.

FORBES.

The next day I received by mail the following letter, dated a day previous to the telegram, stating that the director has not yet received the report of the investigation, which the letter seemingly contradicts:

UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU,
WASHINGTON, September 25, 1922.

Hon. ALBERT B. ROSSDALE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ROSSDALE: Your letter of September 20, in which you requested a copy of the minutes of the investigation of the United States Veterans' Hospital No. 81, the Bronx, N. Y., has been received.

In reply you are informed that the full notes of this report have not as yet been placed in such form that I may make a thorough review of them at the present writing.

Very truly yours,

C. R. FORBES, Director.

One thing is clear and beyond doubt that the public have not been informed of the findings of this remarkable investigation.

The following is an affidavit of a former patient of the hospital who insisted upon testifying and tells of the brutal beating of an insane patient by attendants while the patient was lying upon a bed upon the floor tightly incased in a straitjacket.

STATE OF NEW YORK, County of New York, ss:

Jeremiah W. Woods, being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows: I reside at No. 571 West One hundred and thirtieth Street in the city of New York.

On or about the 11th day of August, 1922, I was up in my ward, No. E-50, as a patient in the United States Veterans' Hospital No. 81, situated in the Bronx. While I was in my ward John B. Martin, a patient, called on me; we then went out for a walk. * * * And then we went down to the New York Velodrome; on that particular night there was a bicycle race there. The rules of the hospital required any patient out after 9 to have a special pass, and we therefore returned by jumping into an automobile to get this pass from the officer of the day. We were talking in the back of the car and the chauffeur had gone past the main entrance, when I saw there a man with his coat and shirt off having hold of another man. * * * I ran down to the main entrance, discovered that it was Martin, and that he had hold of a man by the name of Doctor Diefendorfer. Martin was struggling with the doctor and using vile language; I grabbed hold of him and said: "Jack, what is the matter?" and threw him down on the grass. I had seen Martin before in these fits of insanity and knew he took them. The doctor ran away and as he was going said, "Thanks, Woods." I took Martin then, he being on United States hospital grounds, and tried to talk with him. * * * And then put him behind a bush in a hedge at the corner of Kingsbridge Road and Sedgwick Avenue on a private residence. * * * And then we sat down in the grass; Martin was lying in the grass hollering and screaming; in my estimation the man was out of his mind. As I have said previously, I had seen him in these fits before and knew that he took them. He laid there for about half an hour and I continued to sit with him. * * * All of a sudden one of the guards came over. I do not know his name, save that he is an official guard stationed around the hospital, and asked me what was the matter. Martin jumped up, struck at him, breaking his straw hat; I chased the guard away, saying to get out of the way, I'd take care of Martin. In about 15 or 20 minutes more I saw several policemen come in and take hold of Martin. I said: "This man is a patient in the hospital; he has gone a little off, so don't beat him; if you do, I'll report it." I walked over with one and got to the entrance of the gate, and down came the Red Cross athletic director, Mr. Peck. "Peck," I said, "see that they don't beat Martin." "All right, Jerry; I will."

I knew Peck since I was in Camp Upton. We walked up the drive into the main corridor of the main building. Then several orderlies came and took Martin and carried him over to the G building. I waited awhile and then said: "Well, I guess I'll go up to bed." One of the doctors said, "Wait a minute, Woods," and I waited. And the first thing I knew the orderlies picked me up and carried me over to the G building. I asked them what they were taking me over there for, among a lot of insane men, particularly when I was trying to care for a man who was out of his mind. I struggled a little, but my struggle was no good. They had put Martin in the G building, and I saw a policeman there. I thought that the policemen were going to beat him and myself in this building, so I immediately fell on the floor in a pretense of fainting and laid there with my ears and eyes open and saw everything that went on. The orderlies went in; about two minutes later they returned, picked me up, and put me in bed and strapped me down with sheets. Martin was 10 feet away from me, and we were the only two in that room. They were then still undressing Martin, and then they put him in a strait-jacket. The nurse, Miss Valentine, and the doctor officer of the day left the room while we were being undressed. Martin was struggling against being put into the strait-jacket, and as soon as the nurse and doctor were out of the room the orderlies said, "Give it to him." Then four or five attendants undertook to beat Martin and choked him. Martin was screaming and using vile language and hollering even while the nurse was in the room. I was lying alongside of him and said, "Martin, for God's sake keep quiet or they'll kill you." One man deliberately went over and put his hands on Martin's neck and said, "Now, you — — I will make you keep quiet," and he choked Martin and stuffed a towel down his throat. I said, "If I could get up out of here I'd show you what I'd do to you for doing that to Martin." They replied, "Keep quiet, or we'll fix you." I answered, "I dare you to do it." Meanwhile, Martin still continued to holler. I was tied down in bed; it was then, I guess, about half past 10 or 11. There was no orderly in the room, and I got on to the way they tied me in the bed; not being in a strait-jacket, I finally loosened myself, and thinking I would be doing a humane act, I went over and tried to unloosen Martin from his strait-jacket. He was hollering so much that it attracted the attention of an orderly outside the room, who came up and called other orderlies. Four of them responded; I struck at two or three, and they ordered me into a strait-jacket. When they returned I said, "If ever I get out of this I will take one of you, one at a time; but don't you dare try anything." They went over to Martin and said, "It is coming to him; we have had him in this building before." I told Martin to keep quiet, and the reason he did not, I think, was that he did not understand me, being out of his mind. Two or three hours later they loosened the strait-jacket and put Martin in a private room, so that there was no way of my seeing him, and there being no knob on the inside of the door there was no way of his getting out. He still continued to scream and holler. I spoke to the night orderly and Miss Valentine next morning, and Miss Valentine said, "Jerry, I was willing to walk out of this building because of the doings last night. I don't care; I have my resignation in already, and I am going in about three days. I was so disgusted with what happened last night." I asked her why she put me into a strait-jacket, and she said, "'Doctor ordered it, and the result is it had to be done."

JEREMIAH WOODS.

Sworn to before me this 30th day of September, 1922.

[SEAL.] JAMES THOMAS MURRAY, Jr.,
Notary Public, New York County, No. 505.

The Veterans' Bureau secured an exonerating affidavit from the nurse who had previously criticized the beating of this helpless insane patient. She confided to Jeremiah Woods that she was leaving to enter upon more pleasant and better-paying work, having in prospect an appointment as visiting nurse by the Veterans' Bureau. It would be illuminating to learn what part the prospective appointment as visiting nurse played in the exonerating affidavit.

Whether the investigation is actually over and what its findings are matters little, for I am convinced of its worthlessness. However, the people of my locality and of all New York want to know just what this remarkable investigation brought forth, and it is up to Director Forbes to make it known without further delay.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report to its passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FORDNEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to discuss at any length the conference report on the bill for adjusted compensation to the soldiers, nor the provisions of the bill itself.

This bill has now been pending for a very long time and it is time for final action.

I have supported this legislation in all its phases since it was first presented in Congress. Two years ago I voted for the bill in the House. It was allowed to die in the Senate, and but for the exigencies of the approaching election doubtless it would again find a similar death. The propaganda against this legislation has been very widespread and very misleading; I wonder some time if the people in so short a period have forgotten the great sacrifices made by our soldiers. I believe that our people are still patriotic and that the soldier still holds a place in their hearts. But propagandists have led them to believe that this is a raid by them upon the Treasury that will mean destruction of the national credit. We are not surprised at this when it comes from so high a source as the Secretary of the Treasury, and, indeed, from the President himself, who addressed the Senate upon this bill on the 12th day of July, 1921, and asked that it be not considered. Even now we are told that it faces his veto.

Various amounts have been quoted as the burden that this legislation would place upon the American people. They have been told that it would cost the Nation from four to seven billions of dollars, and the inference has been left by those opposed to the bill that this money would have to be paid immediately and upon such terms as would greatly cripple the country financially.

If experts, who have carefully estimated the amount of money that would be required to meet the provisions of this bill, are at all correct, these statements have been most misleading. The bill is based upon the idea of giving to each soldier who served in France $1.25 additional for each day of service up to the amount of $625, exclusive of his first 60 days of service, and $1 a day to each soldier who did not have foreign service. These payments are spread over a period of 20 years. The amount of money that would be actually involved in meeting the obligations of the bill have been estimated as follows: The first year the payment would be about $77,000,000; the second year it would be $92,000,000; the third year $73,000,000; the fourth year, at which time certain loans upon the certificates to be issued would mature, $370,000,000. From then the amount would decrease as follows: The fifth year would be $148,000,000; the next year $137,000,000; then $92,000,000, $36,000,000, $25,000,000, $21,000,000, $18,000,000, and so on, until 1942, when the payment required would be $144,000,000. From these expert estimates it will thus be shown we would pay on account of this legislation the first year only about the amount we have appropriated each year for Federal aid to good roads and generally over the period of 20 years much less. The Nation is steadily growing in wealth and it has been impossible for me to see that these payments, spread over so long a period, would be at all burdensome, and certainly they do not approach the extent of the burden which those who are opposed to this legislation have claimed in the propaganda sent out.

We have performed a great duty in taking care of the sick and disabled, and there is now ample appropriation provided by Congress for any sick or disabled soldier who can trace his disability to a service origin. We are spending now on their behalf over a million dollars for each day of the year. We are willing to spend more than that, much more, if necessary, to take care of them in vocational training, in hospitalization, and in the payment of compensation and insurance benefits.

When the war was ended many contracts for war supplies were annulled, and these contractors came to the Government and they were reimbursed out of the Treasury for all of their losses, amounting to millions of dollars, and nothing was said about bankrupting the Treasury. It was paid by the Secretary of the Treasury without criticism.

Every mine operator who had placed new equipment or had opened a mine with the hope of supplying Government needs asked for similar legislation and it was granted, and they were paid out of the Treasury in the neighborhood of $800,000,000 and no one objected.

When the railroads were returned by the Government to their owners they were allowed to fund for a period of 10 years the moneys they owed the Government for equipment and trackage, over a billion dollars, while the Government paid them from the Treasury full rental for their properties and including a six months' guaranty after the roads went into private hands. All of these things have been done without protest or without the declaration that they were destructive of the national credit and to me it is somewhat surprising that the opposition to pay our soldiers an adjusted compensation, which would give them the insignificant sum of $2 per day for their services, should have found lodgment in the minds and hearts of patriotic America. We paid a bonus of $20 per month to all civil employees, and are still paying this bonus. Many were exempted from military service because of their particular efficiency in industry and stayed at home at abnormal wages. Over 100,000,000 of population placed upon a selected 4,000,000 the defense of their country and the preservation of the world's civilization, and there should be grateful recognition of what our soldiers accomplished so fully and so quickly.

I regret, however, that the conferees did not retain in this bill the amendment offered by Senator SIMMONS, of North Carolina, and adopted by the Senate, pledging the interest on our loans to foreign Governments to the payment of this indebtedness. It seemed to me a very fitting thing that at least the interest from these great loans should be dedicated to so sacred a service. To my mind this would have been far more just and equitable than to follow the plan urged by President Harding to place a sales tax upon the people for the purpose of meeting this obligation. Why the sales tax when you talk about adjusted compensation for the soldiers? These men faced every form of death by disease and in battle. Many of them were drafted into the service by their Government, and no soldiers on earth ever rendered better service than they. The railroads were paid vast sums of money without a sales tax. The war contractors were paid around $2,000,000,000, because of the cancellation of their contracts, without the imposition of a sales tax to meet it. Many other obligations of the Government, growing out of the war, were paid to men who never saw a day of service, without the demand for a sales tax to make them odious in the minds of the people. Only the soldier, for whom this bill provides the meager sum of $2 per day, for a limited period of time, and not to exceed a total payment of $625 in each case, under the plan of the President and Secretary Mellon, is to be subjected to having his compensation raised by a tax upon the consumption of the country. It seems to me that the proportion of things has been lost by those in authority in the Nation.

But, Mr. Speaker, the matter which I wish to call now to the attention of the House has more particularly to do with another phase of the Government's attitude toward the soldier. The Republican Party claims, and will continue to claim, that the ex-service man is the object of its special care. I might point out at this time the fact that all of the initial legislation providing for compensation for our soldiers, allotments to their families while they were in the service, and insurance upon their lives while at war, was passed by a Democratic Congress, under the leadership of Woodrow Wilson.

I thought that when the soldiers returned from war, regardless of politics, they would be recognized above others in civil-service employment. The Congress itself, in order that this might be done in 1919, under the first deficiency appropriation bill, enacted:

> That hereafter in making appointments to clerical or other positions in the executive branch of the Government, in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, preference shall be given to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, and widows of such, and to the wives of injured soldiers, sailors, or marines who themselves are not qualified, but whose wives are qualified to hold such positions.

This was intended to give to each soldier who successfully passed an examination in the civil service, and whose character was good, preferment in the appointment. I do not know how it has been elsewhere, but in the district which I have the honor to represent—the tenth district of North Carolina—no soldier has been able to pass successfully the watchful eye of the Republican politicians, either in post-office appointments or in rural-carrier appointments, unless such applicant has borne the proper Republican stripe.

On the 30th of March, 1917, President Wilson, by Executive order, provided that the appointment of all postmasters above fourth class should be made upon an examination to be conducted by the Civil Service Commission, and that the highest applicant, if morally and physically fitted, should receive the appointment. This was carried out by the Wilson administration. At least two appointments that I can recall now under the Wilson administration in the district I represent went to Republicans purely because they were given preference under the act of July 11, 1919. These were at Pisgah Forest and Bostic. Under the Wilson administration it was ruled by the First Assistant Postmaster General that this preference act applied to these positions. An examination of the records of the Post Office Department under the preceding administration will disclose that many thousands of appointments were made of Republicans who were successful in securing first place on the list of eligibles.

When President Harding came into office he changed the former Executive order so as to permit the Postmaster General to appoint either of the three certified eligibles. Under this, every maneuver has been resorted to to prevent the appointment of a Democrat, regardless of his position on the eligible list, regardless of his military service, and regardless of his fitness for the position. If the man recommended by some Republican referee has not become certified, new examinations have been asked by the Postmaster General and other devices resorted to. I do not cavil at the Republicans for the appointment of party men, but if there is to be a merit system it should be honestly and justly administered. In North Carolina the appointing power has been handed to a Republican politician, and an ex-service Democrat, however valiant a soldier he may have been, has received no favorable consideration. On his recommendation the plain and explicit act of Congress above quoted has been annulled.

In extenuation of their conduct in these matters, however, the Republican administration has claimed that post-office appointments were not strictly civil-service appointments. This possibly may be correct as a technical interpretation. But it does seem hard, unjust, unfair, and partisan that the ex-service man should receive this discrimination against him. One would naturally think that he, at least, would escape the hands of the ward-heeling politician.

But certainly I thought that when the administration came to purely civil-service appointments the law giving preference to soldiers would be effective. Congress clearly and explicitly provided in the act that in making these appointments in the executive branch of the Government "preference shall be given to honorably discharged soldiers" and their widows. There is no discretion in this language. This act has been set aside by the Post Office Department. The Civil Service Commission has declared its helplessness.

Let me illustrate. A vacancy occurred in the position of rural carrier at Hayesville, Clay County, N. C. This was strictly a civil-service appointment. At the head of the list of eligibles certified to the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General was the name of George B. Thompson. He enlisted in the Army on the 5th day of June, 1917. From July 15 to September 7, 1918, he served in the Mount Kemel sector, and was in some of the most trying engagements of the war. From September 22 of that year to November 11 he served in the Hindenburg sector. He was one of those who helped to break the Hindenburg line, which gave to the Germans one of their first impressions of the valor of the American soldier. He knew what it was to face the shock of German troops. Every danger of war he met most valiantly and fearlessly. He was fighting for the protection of his country and the civilization of the world. He asked no questions. He was at the front when the armistice was signed.

He returned to the country he loved and whose battles he had fought, and was honorably discharged from the Army on April 4, 1919. He had a right to believe that his country would honor his service and that when he had received his discharge and laid aside his uniform if there were preferment in any civil-service employment he would be generously remembered. He stood first on the list of eligibles certified by the Civil Service Commission to the Post Office Department. Service men were seeking positions throughout the country. They had had no opportunity to profit from the war. Theirs had been the trenches. Their ears were accustomed to the bursting of shells and the cracking of machine guns. This boy had been at the front. He had hazarded all. Was he even given the protection and preferment which a plain act of Congress had provided? Not at all. He lacked one thing. He had not voted the Republican ticket. In comparison with this his service was naught.

The act of Congress of July 11, 1919, was futile. What mattered it to the Hon. John Motley Morehead, of North Carolina, that he had been a brave and valiant soldier? What mattered it to the Postmaster General that this boy had helped to turn back the bloody German advance? Had the people not given the Harding administration 7,000,000 majority in the last election and was not this a mandate? So it was claimed. Would it not be disastrous to the Harding administration to have a Democratic ex-service man deliver the letters of his neighbors in a far-off rural district? Of course it would. Would the Postmaster General allow a little act of Congress to stand in his way when the Hon. John Motley had spoken? Most certainly not.

This splendid young soldier thought he was entitled to appointment under the act of Congress and under his position as first on the list of eligibles. I presented this matter to the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, and, on March 21, 1922, he disposed of it as follows:

> In order that you may have a correct understanding of the case, I beg to state that it has been ruled by the Civil Service Commission that the act of July 11, 1919, entitles an eligible who has rendered military service to preference in certification but not necessarily in appointment, and that the appointment of such an eligible was discretionary with, and not mandatory upon, the appointing officer, who may, if he decides that the person eligible lacks qualifications necessary, in the position to be filled, select one of the other eligibles. While, therefore, it is the policy of the department, which is very generally adhered to, that, other things being equal, a preference eligible shall be selected when certified, an exception may be made when it appears that the interests of the service will be better subserved by so doing, and in making such an exception this department is entirely within its privileges under the law and the civil-service rules. In this instance the conclusion was reached after very careful consideration that the appointment of Mr. Garland White would be more favorable to the interests of the service than that of Mr. Thompson and action was taken accordingly.

The fact that Mr. Thompson was not selected for this position does not, of course, imply any reflection upon his character or eligibility for future appointment, and should his name again be certified in connection with a vacancy in Clay County the question of his appointment would receive very careful consideration.

I also presented the situation to the Civil Service Commission and no relief was to be found there. I quote from their letter to me of March 18, 1922:

You are informed that on February 11 the names of the following persons, in the order indicated, were certified to the Post Office Department to fill a vacancy in the position of rural carrier at Hayesville, N. C.:

George B. Thompson	74.00
Frank E. Evans	77.70
Garland E. White	77.60

Mr. Thompson was the only person entitled to military preference and his name headed the certificate. On March 8 the department reported its selection of Mr. Garland E. White, eligible No. 3, effective March 20, 1922.

The appointment of a preference eligible is not mandatory. Passing the required examination entitles such person to be certified above all others, regardless of the comparative rating obtained, and places his qualifications before the appointing officer.

The commission's duty and jurisdiction end when the person entitled to the benefits of the statute has received the preference in certification allowed by the rules. The rules provide for the certification of the highest three names on the register of eligibles appropriate for the position to be filled, and the appointing officer is entitled to select any one of the three. The rules forbid discrimination on account of political or religious reasons, and the commission may investigate a selection where it is charged, with offer of proof, that this provision of the rules has been violated, but with this exception the commission has no jurisdiction to interfere in the matter of selection from among the three names certified. The appointment of a preference eligible is therefore discretionary with the appointing officer. The statute is addressed to his conscience and judgment, and no vested or exclusive right to a particular office or position was intended to be given. If the appointing officer decides that the preference eligible lacks the capacity necessary in the position to be filled and that he will select any of the other eligibles whose names have been certified his decision is not reviewable by the commission. All that the commission can do in such a case is to return the name of the eligible to the register for further certification.

The letter of the Postmaster General states that the act of July 11, 1919, entitles an ex-service man to certification, but not necessarily to appointment. The act does not so state. The language is that he shall be appointed. Of course, if charges were preferred and maintained this would not be expected.

The Civil Service Commission states that they can only investigate discrimination on account of politics and religion. I now invite them to the records in this case. They will find the political discriminaton and that against a soldier of their country and regardless of the act of Congress.

Well, probably our soldiers do not deserve so much at last. Were they not simply performing a duty? Undoubtedly. But what a duty it was. When they were marching away it was one thing. When they have returned it is another. I wish all had been as considerate of the Treasury as the soldier. The war itself contributed to the making of more than 25,000 new millionaires in the United States. Vast sums of profits were made to every industry and to every class. It now seems, however, in the minds of some, at least, that the soldier who might benefit by this bill to the extent of an additional $1 per day for his service is the prime grafter upon the Treasury. The average service of the soldier in the war was about 10 months. Two months of this is excluded because of the $60 bonus already paid for that period. To receive a certificate, payable at the end of 20 years, of the maximum of $625, a soldier would be required to have had a long period of service.

For it's "Tommy this" and "Tommy that" and "Tommy wait outside";
But it's "special train for Tommy" when the trooper's on the tide.

With the Post Office Department it is "Tommy, how'd you vote?" Will Hays may have humanized that department, but unless Tommy voted the Republican ticket he is not a welcome applicant for any civil-service appointment in it or any executive department of the Government.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, from the beginning of history we learn that it has been the custom of all countries to express their gratitude to the victors in war and confer upon them gifts of money or land, or both, and our own country is no exception to the rule. After every war those that took part received some compensation. When the Civil War ended the great West and Middle West was sparsely settled and only waiting the plow to become the garden of our country. Cities then being small, most of the soldiers that composed our Army were from villages and the farm, and after being mustered out went west, received the 160 acres allowed them by the Government, proved up, and became its best citizens.

The soldiers in the last war, being Federal troops and not State troops, the obligation to care for them upon their return rested upon the Federal Government and not upon the States, and the Government should have recognized this fact, as did the platforms of both political parties, and fulfilled its obligation long ago, as all other nations have done; but failing to do so, many States, unwilling that provision should not be made for many in need, passed laws and paid bonuses to those enlisting from the States. In every instance when the people had an opportunity by a referendum to pass upon the question they approved a bonus by a large majority. In Ohio, for instance, the vote was 949,109 for to 324,447 against, a majority of 624,662.

With these facts before us, how can anyone say that it is not the desire of a vast majority of our people that the Federal Government should make the slight provision provided in this bill for the Federal troops that served so valiantly, and cease to give any consideration to this propaganda emanating from those that most benefited by the war—the moneyed interests of the country?

It is said we soon forget the hardships in our strife after the mighty dollar, but it does not seem possible that we can so soon forget the promises we made those boys when they left their families and those they loved so well to endure what was then said to be the greatest hardship that ever fell to the lot of man. Recall for a moment life in the trenches, with mud to the knees, and vermin on every hand. Then again 40 days and more in continuous battle, day and night, in the Argonne Forest, and men wounded and dying on every hand, and then say that $30 per month is sufficient reward for such service when the men at home who took their places were receiving many times that amount and living on the fat of the land. Consider that while a man may not show the effect of such hardships and battles, no one that passed through them is as well or as healthy as he was before. But you say that they did not all suffer the privations. That is true, but they were all willing and did their part as directed.

A nation can not afford to neglect those that answered their country's call in time of need, for while everything may be smooth and quiet to-day no one can tell how soon they may be again called to "shoulder arms" to protect our flag on land and sea. America has had the most loyal and patriotic people in the world. Our schools and colleges have ever instilled in the hearts of the children, and in young men and women, love for the flag and their duty to follow and protect it whenever the occasion required.

Upon the declaration of war our National Guard mobilized at once; every man was ready to go, although many of them had just returned from the border. From all vocations and stations in life men volunteered for service. Our schools and colleges immediately began the organization of companies, and in some instances regiments. They did not wait for the conscription, but volunteered for service at home or abroad as occasion required. Is not such service worthy of every encouragement? It is true that the pittance provided in this bill is not compensation, but it will at least tend to show some appreciation of the sacrifice all those that took part made for their country.

When the war ended and the boys returned to their homes, if return they did, and sought the positions they had left, which it was said would be held open for them, in many instances they found their places filled, themselves out of employment, the cost of living so advanced that the small savings they had in the bank when they left was soon exhausted, if it had not already been used by those they left behind to pay rent and living expenses while they were away fighting for their country.

The insurance and homestead provisions are the important ones in this bill, both of which encourage thrift on the part of the one receiving them and tend to make better citizens by providing for the family as well as the soldier. They not only pay more but are far better, and I believe that 8 out of 10 will select one of these options rather than the cash payment provided for in the bill. The men that composed our Army are among our best citizens and will request that which they believe best for themselves and their families, and only those in great need will ask the cash payment.

We called upon the manhood of the Nation. They came from city and village, from factory and farm. They fought amidst dangers and darkness; they knew no such word as fear or retreat; it was death or victory. They returned amidst the plaudits of thousands and the promise of just rewards. Great Britain, France, Canada, and Belgium each has given more in proportion to their wealth than has the United States, the richest country in the world. Let us pass this bill, reward patriotism, and teach the children to love that flag for which so many soldiers gave their blood and their lives.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS AND SAILORS OF THE CIVIL WAR—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 6507) and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up a conference report and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement was read.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6507) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House on H. R. 6507 state, by way of explanation, that the Senate in passing said bill undertook to consolidate in the one bill eight omnibus pension bills heretofore passed by the House and two Senate omnibus pension bills, omitting certain bills of the House upon which the Senate committee had reported unfavorably. The committee of conference went carefully over the bills not included in the consolidated bill and succeeded in restoring a large number of such House bills, the principal ones omitted being in cases where the proposed beneficiaries had died since the bills passed the House. Also the Senate bills included in the consolidated bill as it passed the Senate were carefully examined by the conference committee, and several of such bills not complying with the rules of the House committee were eliminated by the conferees. The report includes the great majority of the bills as they passed the House.

HAROLD KNUTSON,
J. M. ROBSION,
Managers on the part of the House.

P. J. MCCUMBER,
H. O. BURSUM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House on H. R. 5214, by way of explanation, wish to say that the Senate in passing said bill undertook to consolidate in the one bill seven omnibus pension bills heretofore passed by the House and two Senate omnibus bills, omitting certain bills of the House upon which the Senate committee had reported unfavorably. The committee of conference went carefully over the bills not included in the consolidated bill and succeeded in restoring a large number of such House bills, the principal ones omitted being in cases where the proposed beneficiaries had been members of the Regular Army and Navy Establishments, and whose disabilities did not show service origin.

Also the Senate bills included in the consolidated bill as it passed the Senate were carefully examined by the conference committee, and all such bills being adopted without amendments.

The report includes the great majority of the bills as they passed the House.

HAROLD KNUTSON,
J. M. ROBSION,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KNUTSON. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It was impossible for me to hear the conference report. Will the gentleman explain in a minute or two the important features of the conference report? I do not desire detailed information, but will the gentleman tell us whether the bill deals with individual cases or to any extent changes existing pension laws?

Mr. KNUTSON. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Speaker, that this is strictly an omnibus bill, and contains no legislation whatever. The conferees worked over these bills for 17 hours without taking a recess—17 hours—and I will say to the House that as to the bills that were stricken out in conference 90 per cent of them applied to widows who automatically received their increase on September 1 under the bill H. R. 4, which became a law on that date.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman is through, I wanted to ask him this question—probably it is unnecessary, but just to assure myself: In this amendment that the House has added at the end of the Senate amendment are any bills included that did not pass the House in the omnibus bills that have heretofore passed?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes, sir; there were several, and we accepted them. I will state to the gentleman that we went into the merits of the bills and accepted them.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman think that that would be somewhat exceeding the conferees' authority?

Mr. KNUTSON. No.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW] for a moment.

FEDERAL FUEL DISTRIBUTOR.

Mr. WINSLOW, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, submitted for printing, under the rule, the conference report and accompanying statement on the bill (H. R. 12472) to declare a national emergency to exist in the production, transportation, and distribution of coal and other fuel, granting additional powers to the Interstate Commerce Commission, providing for the appointment of a Federal fuel distributor, providing for the declaration of car-service priorities in interstate commerce during the present and any succeeding emergency, and to prevent extortion in the sale of fuel.

Mr. WINSLOW. I desire to announce, Mr. Speaker, that it is my purpose to call up this report to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts gives notice that he will call up the conference report on the bill to-morrow.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts state in a few words what is the result of the conference report on this bill. Otherwise we shall not know what it contains until it appears in the RECORD to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia calls upon the gentleman from Massachusetts for a statement.

Mr. WINSLOW. Well, Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to do that?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order.

Mr. WINSLOW. It would be desirable to have the statement accompanying the report read. It will furnish the information that the gentleman desires.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, it is out of the usual order entirely, when the chairman of a conference committee presents his report for printing in the RECORD, to call upon him to make a statement. The report will be printed in the morning, and everybody to-morrow will know exactly what is in the report.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I am perfectly aware of that; but we shall not know what is in the report until we get the RECORD to-morrow morning, and I think a brief statement now would enable the Members of the House to have this information. If the gentleman from Wisconsin does not wish that to be done I shall not press it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Massachusetts wants the report read.

Mr. WINSLOW. No; the statement accompanying the report.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my request. I thought my friend from Massachusetts would be able to tell us very briefly just what is in it.

Mr. WINSLOW. I should be obliged to refer to my notes for what is in the statement.

PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report on the bill (H. R. 5214) relating to pensions and increase of pensions.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report on the pension bill.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. KNUTSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

TARIFF BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the conferees on the tariff bill may have until midnight in which to file their report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the conferees on the tariff bill may have until midnight to-night in which to file their report. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand the gentleman from Wyoming has conferred with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] in regard to the matter?

Mr. MONDELL. I have.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And that the arrangement is agreeable to him?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the conference report and accompanying statement on the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes, submitted for printing under the rule:

The Senate amendment strikes out this provision and incorporates them in section 308, and in addition permits the entry under bond of containers for compressed gases which comply with the laws and regulations for the transportation of such containers in the United States, and authorizes the cancellation of the six months' bond if the articles imported for experimental purposes are destroyed during the experiment; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1649: The Senate amendment permits the destruction of waste material resulting from manufacture in bonded warehouse; and the House recedes.

On amendments Nos. 1650, 1651, 1652, and 1653: The House bill provided for the manufacture of cigars in bonded manufacturing warehouses from tobacco imported from any one country. The Senate amendment extended this provision to the manufacture of cigarettes and tobacco and eliminated the requirement that the tobacco be imported from one country; and the Senate recedes on all these amendments.

On amendment No. 1654: Section 315 of the House bill is stricken out and rewritten by the Senate amendment in order to harmonize with paragraph 388 of the House bill. The Senate amendment also provides for the cancellation of the charge against the bond on the exportation of the refined metal produced from the dutiable metal imported, in order to remove the discrimination against the bonded smelter and in favor of the nonbonded smelter, which resulted from the tariff act of 1913; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1655: The Senate amendment strikes out and rewrites section 316 of the House bill, relating to drawback, and restores existing law with certain changes. An amount of domestic wheat equal to not less than 30 per cent of the amount of imported wheat must have been used in order to gain the privilege of drawback upon the exportation of flour or by-products. The rule for the distribution of drawback, where more than one product results, from the manipulation of the imported merchandise, is changed, and the drawback is distributed according to the relative value of the product exported; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1657: The Senate amendment permits the drawback upon flavoring extracts manufactured in the United States when an internal-revenue tax has been paid upon the domestic alcohol used; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1658: The Senate amendment strikes out the provision in the House bill that only domestic tax-paid alcohol may be used in the manufacture of medicinal or toilet preparations in order to gain the benefit of the drawback; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1665: The Senate amendment inserts a new section containing provisions for an elastic tariff. It authorizes the President to increase or decrease the duties specified in this act and to shift to the American valuation system under certain conditions.

Subdivision (a) authorizes the President to increase or decrease duties and to change classifications whenever necessary to equalize the ascertained differences in costs of production. No duty, however, may be increased or decreased more than 50 per cent of the duties specified in Title I, and no authority is given to transfer from the dutiable list to the free list, or vice versa; nor may any duty be changed from specific to ad valorem, or vice versa. The action of the conferees specifies that the differences in costs of production are to be ascertained in the United States and in the principal competing foreign country and removes the limit imposed by this amendment providing that section 315 shall remain in effect only until July 1, 1924.

Subdivision (b) authorizes the President to substitute American valuation for foreign valuation whenever necessary to equalize ascertained differences in costs of production of products within paragraphs 27 and 28 of Title I, under conditions and limitations similar to those prescribed in subdivision (a). The action of the conferees extends the provisions of this subdivision to all articles provided for in Title I but prohibits an increase in rates upon an article so transferred.

Subdivision (c) prescribes the factors which the President is to take into consideration in determining differences in costs of production, and also provides that investigations to assist the President in ascertaining such differences are to be made by the United States Tariff Commission. The action of the conferees eliminates the provision of the Senate amendment that the Tariff Commission hearings shall be public and that the President shall make the findings, hearings, and testimony in all proceedings public as soon as practicable after the issuance of a proclamation.

The President is not authorized to increase rates beyond the specified maximum ad valorem rate fixed in any paragraph of this act. The House recedes with an amendment making clerical changes and the changes indicated.

On amendment No. 1666: The Senate amendment inserts a new section making unlawful unfair methods of competition and unfair acts in the importation of merchandise into the United States which threaten the stability or existence of American industry.

Investigations of cases arising under this section are to be made by the United States Tariff Commission and its findings are subject to review, on questions of law, by the United States Court of Customs Appeals. The final findings of the commission are then transmitted to the President and he is authorized, in case such unfair methods or acts are established to his satisfaction, to impose additional duties upon merchandise imported in violation of the act, and in extreme cases he is authorized to prohibit the offending person from importing any merchandise into the United States; and the House recedes with an amendment making clerical changes.

On amendment No. 1667: The Senate amendment inserts a new section giving the President discretionary powers to impose additional duties or prohibition upon imports from any country discriminating against the overseas commerce of the United States.

This section follows the precedent established by a maximum and minimum provision of the Payne-Aldrich Act, which had for its purpose the obtaining of equality of treatment for American overseas commerce. The Senate amendment, however, is more flexible than the provision of the Payne-Aldrich Act and is designed to reach every form of discrimination, direct or indirect, whereby American commerce is placed at a disadvantage as compared with the commerce of any foreign country.

Sections 301 and 303 of the House bill provide for special negotiations whereby exclusive concessions may be given in the American tariff in return for special concessions from foreign countries. Section 302 of the House bill places in the hands of the President power to penalize the commerce of any foreign country which imposes on its imports, including those coming from the United States, duties which he deems to be "higher and reciprocally unequal and unreasonable." Under the Senate amendment, however, the United States offers, under its tariff, equality of treatment to all nations, and at the same time insists that foreign nations grant to our external commerce equality of treatment; and the House recedes with an amendment rewriting subdivisions (e) and (f) and making further clerical changes.

On amendment No. 1668: The Senate amendment inserts a new section enlarging the powers of and imposing well-defined duties upon the United States Tariff Commission; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1682: The House bill repealed section 3022 of the Revised Statutes and Title I of the emergency tariff act. The Senate amendment strikes out this repeal at this point in the bill and provides for their repeal in the repealing sections of Title IV; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1683: The House bill provided that nothing in this act should be construed as permitting oaths to be demanded or fees to be charged. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision as unnecessary, in view of the several amendments relating specifically to oaths and fees; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1684: The Senate amendment prevents an implied repeal of the provisions of subsection 30 of section 28 of the act of August 5, 1909, relating to the powers and duties of the Assistant Attorney General in charge of customs; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1685: The Senate amendment inserts a new section imposing a duty of 90 per cent foreign value upon automobiles, automobile bodies, automobile chassis, and parts thereof exported prior to February 11, 1919, from the United States, for the use of the American Expeditionary Forces or for the Governments associated with the United States in the war with Germany, and which have been sold; and the House recedes with an amendment making a clerical change.

On amendment No. 1686: The Senate amendment inserted a section authorizing the establishment of "foreign trade zones"; and the Senate recedes.

TITLE IV.—ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS.

On amendment No. 1692: The House bill defined the word "port" to mean a "port of entry." The Senate amendment strikes out this definition in order to retain the existing distinction between a port and a port of entry; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1695: The Senate amendment enlarges the definition in the House bill of "merchandise" to include merchandise the importation of which is prohibited, in order to meet the situation created by recent court decisions holding that the phrase "capable of being imported" means "legally capable of being imported"; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1698: The House bill included in the definition of the word "person" the provision that reference to any officer includes the person authorized to perform the duties of the office. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision, for the various sections refer specifically to the officer; and the House recedes.

On amendments Nos. 1701, 1702, and 1703: The Senate amendments change the definition in the House bill of the word "master" to conform with existing law in order to remove possible confusion in the navigation laws; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1714: The definition in the House bill of the word "appraiser" included the person directed to act as the appraiser. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision and provides specifically in section 500 for the person who is to act; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1715: The House bill defined the phrase "date of exportation." The Senate amendment strikes out this definition in order that the phrase will retain the well-established meaning now given it by the courts; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1716: The Senate amendment strikes out the definition in the House bill of "proof spirit" in order to permit the definition in section 3249 of the Revised Statutes to apply; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1717: The Senate amendment strikes out the definition in the House bill of "proof gallon" in order to permit the definition in section 3250 of the Revised Statutes to apply; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1718: The Senate amendment strikes out the definition in the House bill of "wine gallon" in order that the existing definition and practice may apply; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1719: The Senate amendment strikes out the definition in the House bill of the word "ton" because it conflicted with the use of the word in connection with the tonnage of vessels and in order that the existing definition and practice may prevail; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1720: The Senate amendment strikes out the definition in the House bill of "United States" and inserts a definition to conform with Titles I and II; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1721: The House bill provided for the "American valuation plan" as the basis for assessing ad valorem duties and defined "value" to mean, first, the selling price of the comparable and competitive domestic article; second, in the absence of such value, the selling price of the imported article or a constructive selling price in the United States based on any facts accessible to the appraiser establishing such price. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision in the House bill and substitutes, with minor changes, the foreign valuation system of existing law. The Senate amendment provides that the value of imported merchandise shall be (1) the foreign value or the export value, whichever is higher; (2) in the absence of the foreign value and the export value, then the United States value, which is defined to be the American selling price of the imported article less the charges accruing subsequent to the shipment of the merchandise to the United States, in order to reach a constructive foreign value; and (3) in the absence of the foreign value, the export value, and the United States value, then the cost of production.

The Senate amendment also defines the American selling price of the domestic article to be the wholesale price in the principal markets of the United States of any article manufactured or produced in the United States, and in the event that the President proclaims, under the provisions of subdivision (b) of section 315, that the value shall be determined according to the American selling price, then the value of the imported merchandise shall be determined by ascertaining the American selling price of a similar competitive domestic article; and the House recedes with an amendment making clerical changes.

On amendment No. 1722: Sections 403 and 404 of the House bill carried into law the prior administrative definitions of "purchased" merchandise and of merchandise imported "otherwise than by purchase," which were adopted in order to secure necessary statements upon invoices. The Senate amendment strikes out these two sections and specifically requires in section 481 the statement on invoices of such facts as are necessary for an appraisement and classification of merchandise; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1726: The House bill required a statement in the manifest of the names of the owners of the vessel according to the vessel's register. The Senate amendment strikes out this requirement, as the names can be obtained whenever necessary from the register; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1728: The House bill contained no provision for a list of the baggage on board the vessel in the absence of the owner. The Senate amendment requires such list; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1732: The House bill permitted vessels of regular lines to proceed to their port of destination without reporting at the first port of arrival. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision and requires all vessels to report at the first port of arrival as a safeguard against smuggling and the illicit traffic in liquor; and the House recedes.

On amendments Nos. 1734 and 1735: The House bill placed the report and entry of vessels under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of Commerce now has such jurisdiction, and the Senate amendments restore that jurisdiction to the Secretary of Commerce, and possible confusion in the administration of the navigation laws is eliminated. The amendments necessary to prevent a conflict between the jurisdiction of the two departments have been made throughout Title IV; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1737: The House bill provided only for delivery of the original manifest at the time of making entry of the vessel. The Senate amendment requires the delivery of an additional copy; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1738: See amendment No. 1734.

On amendment No. 1743: The House bill imposed a stated fine of $500 upon every master who failed to make the report or entry of his vessel. The Senate amendment imposes an elastic fine of not more than $1,000; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1751: The Senate amendment corrects a typographical error in the House bill by striking out the penalty of $500 and restoring the penalty of $5,000 imposed under existing law; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1757: The House bill made no distinction between merchandise and baggage. The existing law and practice makes such distinction, and the Senate amendment retains this distinction. The necessary amendments are made throughout Title IV; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1772: The Senate amendment provides that a vessel arriving in distress is not required to make entry, a provision of existing law omitted in the House bill; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1783: See amendment No. 1734.

On amendments Nos. 1793 and 1794: See amendment No. 1757.

On amendment No. 1800: See amendment No. 1757.

On amendment No. 1803: See amendment No. 1757.

On amendment No. 1807: The House bill was a codification of sections 2891, 2892, 2894, and 2896 of the Revised Statutes. The Senate amendment strikes out the provision in the House bill and rewrites the section in order to make it conform, with minor changes, with existing law and practice; and the House recedes.

On amendments Nos. 1808, 1809, and 1810: See amendment No. 1757.

On amendments Nos. 1812 and 1813: See amendment No. 1757.

On amendment No. 1822: See amendment No. 1757.

On amendment Nos. 1826, 1827, and 1828: See amendment No. 1757.

On amendment No. 1839: The House bill imposed a penalty of $100 upon a customs officer who quits his station or neglects or fails to perform his duties. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1845: The House bill imposed a penalty of $100 for interfering with a customs officer in the performance of his duty. The Senate amendment increases this penalty to $500; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1854: The House bill made possible a distinction between the owner and the consignee of imported merchandise. The Senate amendment makes the consignee the only person responsible in the importation of merchandise, and the necessary changes have been made throughout the title; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1856: See amendment No. 1854.

On amendment No. 1861: The House bill subjected vehicles to the provisions of law relating to vessels. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision and specifically provides for vehicles wherever necessary, because vessels are within the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce and vehicles are within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1873: See amendment No. 1757.

On amendment No. 1886: The House bill failed to provide for the forfeiture of an article the importation of which is prohibited. The Senate amendment makes this provision; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1890: The House bill authorized the through transportation of sealed cars. The Senate amendment rewrites the provision, leaving it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to stop the cars at the border and to examine the merchandise if he deems it necessary to safeguard against smuggling; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1892: The House bill provided that in case the person in charge of the sealed car fails to proceed promptly to the port of destination and deliver the merchandise he shall be subject to a penalty equal to the value of the merchandise if subject to duty, or subject to a penalty of $25 if the merchandise is free of duty. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision and restores existing law, which imposes a penalty in such case of not more than $1,000 fine or imprisonment for not more than five years, or both, regardless of whether or not the merchandise is subject to duty; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1895: The Senate amends the provision of section 3114 of the Revised Statutes so that it will be applicable to all vessels documented under the laws of the United States engaged in the foreign or coasting trade. The existing statute applies only to such vessels engaged in the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, and because of the date on which the section became law it has been construed as not applicable to the coasting trade on the Pacific coast. Section 3115 of the Revised Statutes provides for the remission of the duties imposed under section 3114 where the repairs were necessary to enable the vessel to proceed to her port of destination, and is reenacted without change in order to make certain its application to section 3114 as amended; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1896: Section 481 of the House bill required a consular invoice at the time of entry, or, in the absence of such invoice, a pro forma invoice and a bond to produce the certified invoice. The Senate amendment embodies these provisions in subdivision (b) of section 484, where all of the provisions of law relating to entry of merchandise and the papers or documents required at the time of entry are grouped in one section. Section 482 of the House bill required all certified invoices to be made out in triplicate and to be signed by the seller, manufacturer, or owner. The Senate amendment struck out this section and incorporated its provisions in section 482, so that all provisions relating to the requirements of a declaration before the consul may be found in one section. Section 483 of the House bill related to the disposition of the consular invoice. This section is stricken out by the Senate amendment and included in section 482 for the same reason. Section 484 of the House bill specified the statements to be included in the invoice. The Senate amendment strikes out this section, and its provisions, with certain changes, are incorporated in section 481, which contains all of the provisions relating to the contents of the consular invoice. The House bill only required the invoice to state from whom the merchandise was purchased; the Senate amendment requires the invoice to state in addition the person to whom the merchandise is sold. The House bill did not require a statement of the kind of currency; the Senate amendment requires such statement in the invoice. The Senate amendment also authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to require additional facts if he deems it necessary; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1897: Section 485 of the House bill related to the declaration before the consul. It required a repetition in the declaration of many of the statements required in the invoice. The Senate amendment, in section 482, provides concisely for all of the statements not provided for in the invoice, and then requires a declaration that all of the statements in the invoice and entry are true and correct; and the House recedes with an amendment authorizing the shipper to obtain a quadruplicate copy of the consular invoice, if the merchandise is intended for immediate transportation.

On amendment No. 1898: Section 486 of the House bill attempted to codify various sections of existing law relating to certification before the consul. The section failed to include several provisions relating to the duties of the consular officers. Inasmuch as these matters are within the jurisdiction of the Department of State and are now governed by the regulations of that department, the Senate amendment strikes out this section and restores existing law; and the House recedes with an amendment to conform with the action of the conferees on amendment No. 1897.

On amendment No. 1900: Section 488 of the House bill authorized the collector to require a statement as to cost of production and partially defines cost of production, authorized him to accept such statement in lieu of the certified invoice, and authorized him to require a statement in the case of consigned merchandise by a person other than the manufacturer. The Senate amendment strikes out this section and, in section 484, authorizes the collector or the appraiser to require a statement showing the cost of production; cost of production is defined in section 402; the statement can not be accepted in lieu of the certified invoice, for it does not furnish all of the information necessary; and the authority to require the statement in the case of consigned merchandise is placed in section 481; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1903: The Senate amendment strikes out section 490 of the House bill and places, in section 484, all of the provisions relating to the entry of merchandise which were in sections 481, 488, 490, 491, and 493 of the House bill. The House bill provided merely for a statement in the form of an invoice where the certified consular invoice was not produced. The Senate amendment requires the production of a shipper's or seller's invoice in such cases. The House bill did not specifically except the cases where a formal entry is not possible. The Senate amendment specifically excepts these cases and, in sections 490, 498, 552, and 553 provides for their entry. The House bill required the production of a bill of lading at the time of making entry. The Senate amendment, in subdivision (c) of section 484, authorizes the collector to accept a shipping receipt or other satisfactory evidence in cases where there is no bill of lading, such as shipments by express or parcels post; it also authorizes the collector to accept a bond in cases where a bill of lading has been issued but is not produced at the time of making entry, and provides that any person injured as a result of the delivery may sue directly on the bond. The House bill required statements at the time of entry as to value and classification of the merchandise; the Senate amendment requires these statements in the invoice and authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to require at the time of entry such additional facts as he deems necessary; and the House recedes with an amendment requiring the consignee to make a declaration under oath that he is unable to produce a certified invoice, whenever he makes an entry without such invoice.

On amendment No. 1904: The Senate amendment strikes out all of section 491 and the first paragraph of section 492 of the House bill and incorporates their provisions in section 485, where all of the provisions relating to the declaration at the time of entry are enumerated. Section 491 of the House bill provided for a declaration to be signed by the owner, importer, consignee, or agent, but did not provide for the specific statements to be included within the declaration. The Senate amendment enumerates the statements to be made in the declaration and requires a declaration as to the truth of all statements in the invoice and other documents filed at the time of entry. Section 491 of the House bill authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe regulations for the entry of periodicals, and this provision is placed in subdivision (b) of 485 of the Senate amendment. The House bill also authorized the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce to require statements for statistical purposes. These provisions are eliminated from the declaration and placed in subdivision (e) of section 484, as they relate to entry.

The first paragraph of section 492 of the House bill provided for an owner's declaration in the event that the entry is made by an agent. The Senate amendment includes this provision in subdivision (c) of section 485. Under the present law the consignee is always liable for additional or increased duties, even though he is not the actual owner of the merchandise. The Senate amendment relieves him of this liability if he declares that he is not the actual owner, if he furnishes the name and address of the owner, and if he produces within 90 days a declaration of the actual owner. The Senate amendment also requires separate forms for the declaration in the case of merchandise imported in pursuance of a purchase or agreement to purchase, and merchandise imported otherwise than in pursuance of the purchase or agreement to purchase; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1908: Section 493 of the House bill is stricken out by the Senate amendment and placed in subdivision (f) of section 484, in order that all of the provisions relating to entry may be found in one section; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1910: The House bill, in the provision for a bond for the return of merchandise not sent to the public stores, included a provision that an importer or consignee who desired to make entry but who was not in possession of the invoices and other documents should give a bond for their production. This provision is stricken out by the Senate amendment and included within section 490, in order not to confuse the bond for the return of packages with the bond for the production of missing documents; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1913: The House bill required the bond given for the production of packages to include a condition for the payment of increased or additional duties. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision, for it was a change in existing law and the present practice does not indicate a necessity for it, for the Government is in possession of a sufficient quantity of the merchandise to insure against any failure to pay the increased or additional duties; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1914: The provisions of the House bill are stricken out in conformity with the action of the conferees on amendment No. 1913; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1915: See amendment No. 1854.

On amendment No. 1916: The Senate amendment restores a provision omitted in the House bill authorizing the consignee to make corrections in his entry at any time before the invoice or the merchandise has come under the observation of the appraiser for the purposes of appraisement. This is a reenactment with a slight change of Paragraph I, Section III, of the act of 1913. This paragraph, however, has recently been construed as not giving the privilege to make corrections after the documents have been delivered to the appraiser, and the Senate amendment extends the privilege by the addition of the phrase "for the purpose of appraisement," in accordance with the intent of the original paragraph and with a long-standing practice; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1917: The House bill repealed Paragraph I of Section III of the act of 1913, imposing upon the collector the duty to cause the merchandise to be appraised, and did not contain a substitute. The Senate amendment restores this necessary provision; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1920: The Senate amendment restores the provision of existing law, omitted in the House bill, that the additional duties shall not be construed to be penal; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1921: The Senate amendment restores the provision of existing law giving the Secretary of the Treasury authority to remit additional duties in the case of a manifest clerical error; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1923: The House bill provided that additional duties shall be remitted upon a finding of the Board of General Appraisers that there was no intention to defraud or to conceal or misrepresent the facts, but failed to prescribe the procedure. The Senate amendment authorizes the Board of General Appraisers to prescribe the procedure; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1924: The Senate amendment is a reenactment with a slight change of a provision of existing law creating a presumption of fraud in proceedings other than a criminal prosecution in the event that the appraised value exceeds the declared value by more than 100 per cent; and the House recedes with an amendment making a clerical change.

On amendment No. 1927: The Senate amendment conforms with the action of the conferees on amendment No. 1903; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1928: The Senate amendment strikes out the words "in said pending cases"; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 1929: The Senate amendment inserts the authority of the collector to liquidate the entry in accordance with the final appraisement; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1930: The House bill provided for a tentative entry and a tentative appraisement of imported merchandise, to give the importer an opportunity to secure the necessary facts in order to make a proper entry under the American valuation system. The provision is unnecessary because of the change in basis of valuation; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1933: The House bill provided that in case all of the documents were not produced the collector should place the merchandise in a bonded warehouse. The Senate amendment gives the collector a discretion, and he may take a bond to produce the missing documents and permit entry under the provisions of section 484 without sending the merchandise to a bonded warehouse; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1936: See amendment No. 1854.

On amendment No. 1946: The House bill required the collector to destroy all merchandise subject to an internal-revenue tax if he was of the opinion that it would not sell for a sufficient amount to pay such taxes. Section 3368 of the Revised Statutes was recently amended to permit cigarettes and tobacco to be given to hospitals for the use of veterans of the World War. The Senate amendments retain this provision; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1953: See amendment No. 1854.

On amendment No. 1955: Section 502 of the House bill is stricken out by the Senate amendment and incorporated in section 498, which includes all of the provisions applicable to entry under regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1956: Section 503 of the House bill provided for a bond in the case of entry under regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury. This section is stricken out, and under the provisions of section 498 the Secretary may require a bond under his rules and regulations if he deems it necessary; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1963: The House bill failed to authorize the collector to examine the baggage in order to ascertain whether it contained articles free of duty or prohibited. The Senate amendment vests him with this authority; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1975: Section 506 of the House bill provided for entry under the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury. These provisions are incorporated in section 498, which covers all importations that can not be entered and declared under sections 484 and 485. The Senate amendment also includes merchandise within the provisions of the act of June 8, 1896, which was repealed in the House bill. This act permits the packing in one package of numerous small packages of slight value belonging to different persons; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1983: The House bill did not prescribe a minimum number of packages to be sent to the public stores for examination. The Senate amendment prescribes that not less than one package of every invoice and not less than 1 package of every 10 packages shall be designated and sent for examination unless the Secretary of the Treasury prescribes a lesser number. The Senate amendment also authorizes the collector or the appraiser to require additional packages; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1988: Section 508 of the House bill prescribed the duty of the appraiser. This section is stricken out by the Senate amendment and is incorporated in section 500, where the duties of the appraiser, the assistant appraiser, and examiner are enumerated in conformity with existing law and practice. The Senate amendment also includes a provision of existing law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to designate an official of the customs as acting appraiser at ports where there are no appraisers; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1990: The House bill did not prescribe the method of filing an appeal for reappraisement. The Senate amendment provides that the appeal must be filed with or mailed to the Board of General Appraisers; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1991: The House bill limited the period within which the collector could appeal to 30 days. The Senate amendment extends this period to 60 days to conform with existing law, as a 30-day period was considered insufficient; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1992: The Senate amendment establishes the date of the appraiser's report as the beginning of the 60-day period, in accordance with the decisions of the board; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1993: See amendment No. 1854.

On amendment No. 1995: The Senate amendment establishes the date of the personal delivery or the date of mailing of the written notice of appraisement as the date on which the 10-day period commences; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 1997: The Senate amendment restores the necessary provision of existing law omitted in the House bill that the consignee must comply with all of the provisions of law relating to the entry and appraisement of merchandise before he can file a valid appeal for a reappraisement; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2020: The Senate amendment reenacts a provision of existing law and extends it to include a final decision of the Board of General Appraisers. It prevents the Secretary of the Treasury from reversing or modifying any ruling or decision adversely to the United States, except in concurrence with an opinion of the Attorney General recommending the same or a final decision of the Board of General Appraisers; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2021: The Senate amendment reenacts without change a provision of existing law not included in the House bill; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2024: See amendment No. 1854.

On amendment No. 2030: Section 513 of the House bill permitted the abandonment of perishable merchandise only when the quantity to be abandoned was 10 per cent or more of the invoice quantity, and it required delivery to the collector in every instance. The Senate amendment strikes out this section and rewrites it in section 505, permits the abandonment of 5 per cent or more of the total quantity of perishable merchandise, and makes a delivery unnecessary if it is so far destroyed as to be nondeliverable; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2032: The Senate amendment strikes out all of sections 515, 516, 517, 518, and 519 of the House bill and restores existing law because it was deemed impracticable to make a complete codification of the statutes relating to the importation of liquor; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2041: The House bill authorizes inspection of importers' books and imposes an additional duty of 15 per cent in case of failure to permit such inspection. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision and inserts the provisions of existing law relating to the inspection of exporters' books and the inspection of importers' books, and authority to prohibit the importation or to withhold delivery of merchandise is given in case of a refusal by the importer; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2042: The Senate amendment strikes out section 524 of the House bill relating to legal tender and restores existing law, as it was deemed impracticable to codify all of the statutes and decisions relating to legal tender; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2053: Title IV applies to decisions of the collector upon the questions not within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Treasury, particularly questions under the navigation laws within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Commerce. The Senate amendment is intended to eliminate all doubt as to the extension of a remedy by protest of matters not falling within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2054: Under the existing law there is no remedy in the event that the importer has made a clerical error, for the remedy is confined to the case of a manifest clerical error. The effect of the Senate amendment permits the filing of protest and a reliquidation of the entry for a clerical error discovered within one year after date of the entry, or within 60 days after liquidation when liquidation is made more than 10 months after the date of entry; and the House recedes with an amendment striking out the phrase "in any entry or liquidation," in order to avoid misinterpretation.

On amendment No. 2056: The House bill changed existing law and required the importer to make additional statements in his protest. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision and restores existing law, which has been well defined by decisions; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2059: The Senate amendment permits a protest to be amended at any time prior to the first docket call; and the House recedes.

The provisions of the House bill were susceptible of doubtful interpretation. The Senate amendment strikes out this section and provides for a more detailed and practical method of getting the facts before the appraising officers. If the American manufacturer, producer, or wholesaler is not satisfied with the appraiser's action, he may, under subdivision (a) of section 516, file an appeal for reappraisement or file a protest under the provisions of subdivision (b). In both instances the action will be taken upon an actual importation. The Senate amendment also assures a proper notice to the opposing parties and assures the privacy of documents and papers; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2072: The Senate amendment authorizes a board of three general appraisers or a general appraiser to obtain analyses of imported merchandise by Government laboratories or bureaus; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2077: The provisions of section 533 of the House bill are stricken out by the Senate amendment and rewritten and rearranged in section 520. The only material change is in permitting a correction in the case of a manifest clerical error within 60 days after liquidation, when liquidation is made more than 10 months after the date of entry instead of within one year after the date of entry; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2078: The House bill was a revision of the existing statute of limitations. No important changes were made, and in order to retain the benefit of numerous court decisions the Senate amendment reenacts existing law, except for the addition of the phrase "after the expiration of 60 days after the date of liquidation when liquidation is made more than 10 months after date of entry"; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2079: The House bill provided for the furnishing of information by executive departments and independent establishments. On amendment No. 2083: The Senate amendment authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to use, in the District of Columbia, not more than eight customs officials to assist in the enforcement of this act; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2084: A recent decision of the circuit court of appeals holds that existing law does not prevent the importation of merchandise bearing the same trade-mark as merchandise of the United States, if the imported merchandise is genuine and if there is no fraud upon the public. The Senate amendment makes such importation unlawful without the consent of the owner of the American trade-mark, in order to protect the American manufacturer or producer; and the House recedes with an amendment requiring that the trade-mark be owned, at the time of the importation, by a citizen of the United States or by a corporation or association created or organized within the United States.

On amendment No. 2085: The House bill provided for the transportation under bond of merchandise from the port of arrival to another port for entry if the port of destination is shown in the papers. On amendment No. 2086: See amendment No. 1886.

On amendment No. 2088: See amendment No. 1886.

On amendment No. 2097: The Senate amendment eliminates the provision of the House bill that merchandise in bonded warehouses must be exported in the original packages in which it was imported to be entitled to a drawback, in order to harmonize with the provisions of section 562; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2098: The Senate amendment permits the destruction of merchandise entered under bond, in order to make it unnecessary to export worthless merchandise to avoid the payment of duties; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2136: The Senate amendment incorporates the provisions of the "Narcotic drugs import and export act," which became a law after the passage of the House bill; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2144: The House bill imposed a penalty of $5,000 upon the person in charge of any vehicle for a failure to make a report or entry or for unloading merchandise before a report or entry. The Senate amendment reduces this penalty to $500, for the penalty of $5,000 is considered excessive; and the House recedes.

On amendments Nos. 2152 and 2153: The House bill imposed a penalty equal to the value of the merchandise upon the master of a vessel who allows merchandise to be unladen within four leagues from the coast of the United States and before the vessel has come to the proper place for discharging the merchandise. The Senate amendment makes this penalty twice the value of the merchandise but not less than $1,000; and the House recedes.

On amendments Nos. 2160 and 2161: The Senate amendments make the penalty twice the value of the merchandise but not less than $1,000, in order to conform with the penalty agreed upon in amendment No. 2152; and the House recedes.

Almighty God, in the noise and confusion and fear of the world Thou art our refuge and our strength, an ever present help in time of trouble. Though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea, though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, help us to rest in the Lord and to wait patiently for Him. We bring to Thee our thanksgiving this morning for mercies seen and unseen. Forgive our sins. Strengthen us unto good word and work. Endow the Members of the United States Senate this day with health and vigor for that Thou hast appointed unto them. CONDITIONS IN CONNELLSVILLE COKE REGION, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, in the nature of a memorial, I beg to have read the telegram which I send to the desk, which came to me this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the telegram presented by the Senator from Georgia.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

[Western Union Telegram.]

BROWNSVILLE, PA. September 14, 1922.

Hon. THOMAS WATSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The coal operators of the Connellsville coke region are waging open war on men, women, and children of this field, where miners are on strike and operators refuse to meet the miners to work a settlement. Five thousand families have been evicted. They are evicting 100 every day. It will be only a matter of time until Fayette County, Pa., will be a county of homeless men, women, and children. We hope something can be done to stop this outrage, which is a disgrace to free America.

JOHN O'LEARY,
International Board Member of United Mine Workers of America.
WM. FEENY,
United Mine Workers of America, West Brownsville, Pa.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I received a telegram similar to that just read. I see that the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is here. May I ask him if this is not a part of the anthracite controversy?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; the Connellsville region is in southwestern Pennsylvania where coking coal is produced.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator if he has had any information in regard to the matter covered by the telegram?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; it is a matter of common knowledge in western Pennsylvania. The operators there have expressed a willingness to pay the same wages, I understand, that are paid in other bituminous districts. The controversy is entirely over the recognition of the union, the men who still remain out on strike insisting upon recognition of the union in a field never before unionized. That is the sole reason for the dispute at the present time. There is no controversy about wages.

Mr. BORAH. I have reference now to the manner in which women and children are being treated there.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. My information has been that most of the companies there made no effort whatever to evict their former working people from company houses; that they have been allowed to continue in possession, and no effort has been made to collect the rent in most cases, while in other cases the rent has been reduced during the period of the strike. Of course I do not mean to contradict any statement of fact as to particular mines. There may have been cases of eviction, but I am certain that there is no general policy of eviction such as is indicated in the telegram.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, some years ago when the absentee landlords of Ireland were living in England and on the continent in luxury, which they could afford on account of the high rent wrung from Irish tenants who were evicted from the hovels in which they lived, there was a thrill of horror and indignation throughout this country and all other civilized countries. We are now told by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] that men, women, and children are being thrown out upon the approach of winter because the mine operators refuse to recognize the union.

Why should any mine operator, corporation, or individual refuse to recognize what is the fact, namely, the union, whether it be of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the union of typesetters, or the union of coal diggers? We have the bankers' union; we have the manufacturers' union; we have the union of all those who are engaged in employing and exploiting labor. Why should thousands of people be thrown into the streets and into the fields at the approach of winter because some arrogant union of operators refuses to recognize a union of the men who work to make them rich?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The telegram will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BALL:

A bill (S. 3998) for the relief of John R. Nicholson, jr.; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. WILLIS:

A bill (S. 3999) granting a pension to Jennie T. Allen (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR ROBINSON.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD in 8-point type a speech which was delivered on yesterday by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the Women's Indiana Democratic Clubs at Indianapolis, Ind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MOSES. May I ask what is the source of the speech, Mr. President?

Mr. HARRISON. It is a speech which was delivered on yesterday by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] at Indianapolis. It is a very good Democratic speech, I may say.

Mr. MOSES. I thoroughly understand the character of the speech. I merely desire to ascertain its source.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi for the printing in the RECORD of the speech referred to by him?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on yesterday a speech which had been made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] was inserted in the RECORD. That was a political speech. The speech now desired to be printed in the RECORD by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is also a political speech. When the latter speech shall have been printed in the RECORD there will then have been printed one speech on each side, and therefore I am not going to object to the speech of the Senator from Arkansas being printed in the RECORD; but in future I desire to say as to political speeches I am going to object to their being printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HARRISON. Is the Senator going to object to the printing in the RECORD of both Republican and Democratic speeches?

Mr. SMOOT. I am going to object to the printing in the RECORD of both Republican and Democratic speeches.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator ought to object to the printing in the RECORD of Republican speeches, at any rate.

Mr. SMOOT. I intend to do so. I shall object to the printing in the RECORD of both Republican and Democratic political speeches.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the speech of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], at the request of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], will be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type.

Senator ROBINSON'S speech is as follows:

ADDRESS DELIVERED TO WOMEN'S INDIANA DEMOCRATIC CLUBS, INDIANAPOLIS, SEPTEMBER 14, 1922.

Senator ROBINSON said:

"In political discussions personal attacks are rarely justified and never illuminative of public issues. Intimate friendship with both Senators WATSON and NEW prompts me to declare that what is said in this address with reference to their records is intended as legitimate criticism arising out of political and not personal differences.

"It is to be hoped that no Democrat during the course of the campaign now in progress will assail them or other Republican leaders with that bitterness and venom which characterized the public speeches of Mr. Beveridge in 1912 and in 1914, when he denounced the senior Senator from Indiana as a porch climber and a political gorilla.

CAUSES OF REPUBLICAN VICTORY IN 1920.

"Two years ago Democratic candidates encountered defeat, largely because of the restraints imposed on industry and commerce by the Government during the war and continued after the necessity for them apparently had passed.

"Too much interference with business, high taxes unnecessarily imposed to meet war costs, and failure promptly to relieve from war restraints on business produced a state of fretfulness and resentment in the public mind, forcefully epitomized in the expression, 'Let us have a change.'

"On this platform radicals who had been threatened with imprisonment, business men who had suffered losses through Government interference, and all who were anxious that business conditions revert to pre-war standards united politically, with the result that the Republican Party enjoyed the fruits of a victory which it had neither earned by its record nor justified by its pledges.

"The habit of looking to Washington for relief from unsatisfactory conditions long has been assiduously cultivated in political discussions by the representatives of the Republican Party, who, after the elections in 1920, were confronted with demands for additional national legislation imposing further restraints on business, notwithstanding Republican victory in 1920 was brought about on the theory that Government interference with private affairs promptly would be abated through Democratic defeat.

"President Harding and his advisers seem to have forgotten the influences which brought them success, and appear to have yielded to ill-considered demands for the further extension of Federal powers and the multiplication of national agencies.

"The effective conduct of the war made necessary the imposition of high taxes on excess profits and large incomes. The Democratic policy in this regard was fully justified by conditions which it had neither contributed to create nor possessed the power to avoid.

"During the war the subordination of private shipments to the transportation of troops and war supplies caused business men and citizens generally great inconvenience, annoyance, and loss. All this they were willing to bear for patriotic reasons. The restraints imposed by the espionage act and similar laws were justified as emergency war measures indispensable to the Nation's triumph in the war.

"The food control act and related measures of doubtful constitutionality proved intolerable when permitted to remain in force after the return of peace.

"The slogan, 'Less government in business, and more business in government,' summarized the state of the public mind and rallied to the Harding standard thousands of citizens who were anxious to throw off the legal restraints imposed by war measures and to avail themselves of full freedom in the conduct of their businesses.

UNIVERSAL DISAPPOINTMENT IN PRESENT REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION.

"It is not surprising, considering the confused and heterogeneous forces through which it obtained power, that the present administration has disappointed the hopes of business men and forfeited the public confidence.

"To prove the universality of this disappointment and disgust I shall not quote as witnesses Democrats, whose declarations may be prejudiced by political considerations. On the contrary, let me call to the stand Republicans of national renown whose credibility can not be questioned, especially when they testify 'against interest.'

CONGRESSMAN WILL WOOD A WITNESS AGAINST HIS PARTY.

"November 17, 1921, the present chairman of the Republican congressional campaign committee, Hon. WILLIAM R. WOOD, a Representative from the State of Indiana, accurately expressed the public contempt for the failure of the Republican Party to meet its obligations in the following language:

"I know the very serious condition that is prevailing throughout the land. I am only speaking the truth when I say that the people of this country, employed in every vocation and in every character of business, are giving this Congress hell. They are doing it because we have done nothing to stimulate business. They are doing it because we have done nothing to give employment to the unemployed. They are doing it because we have done nothing to benefit the farmer and stimulate the price of the farmer's product.

"What a terrific arraignment, and by what a reliable authority!

"It would be ungenerous to question the truthfulness of this witness against the Republican Party here in his home State where his reputation is well known and his credibility unimpeachable. Do you know the Hon. WILLIAM R. WOOD? He nominated President Harding in the convention at Chicago. He is the chairman of the Republican congressional campaign committee.

SECRETARY OF WAR WEEKS.

"The next witness is John W. Weeks, Secretary of War, formerly Member of the House of Representatives and United States Senator from Massachusetts. Secretary Weeks, expressing his disappointment at the failure of the present Congress to meet its responsibilities, declared in substance in a public address that the National Legislature has descended to the low level of contemptible mediocrity.

THE EVIDENCE OF OTHER GREAT REPUBLICAN LEADERS.

"Other great Republican leaders, including BORAH, JOHNSON, LA FOLLETTE, and LENROOT, repeatedly have expressed emphatic protest against and profound dissatisfaction with the prevailing legislative and executive policies of the Republican Party.

"Indeed, the administration's champions in the Senate seem to have been reduced to a deaf professional apologist, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and a blind advocate, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK].

"So apt and ready is the first in efforts to uphold the discredited standard of his party that, no matter how foolish the mistake or indefensible the purpose, if stamped 'Republican,' the Senator from Indiana is always prompt to excuse the one and to espouse the other.

"The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] is a mathematical genius, whose resourcefulness is disclosed by the production of figures from unknown and undiscoverable sources to support an imaginary fictitious Republican saving of $7,000,000,000 in 1920–1923, inclusive, notwithstanding due respect for history would compel the witness to credit Democrats in part at least with such portion of the alleged economies as occurred before March 4, 1921, when President Harding was inaugurated.

"The Senator from Illinois is the chairman of the senatorial Republican campaign committee. He habitually supplies lack of information with vividness of imagination. It was he who said in an interview published in the Washington Times, June 24, 1922:

"Persons might vote for a woman for superintendent of public schools, or for the town council, or other little jobs like that, but when it comes to the Senate of the United States they will simply not do it. * * *

"This declaration is medieval in its narrowness. The women of America, in respect to voting and holding office, are admittedly equal in legal right to the men of the Nation. They will be slow to support the candidates of a party whose campaign manager publicly humiliates and discredits them.

"Bear in mind that the proof here presented to show the widespread public disappointment in the proceedings of the present administration comes exclusively from Republican witnesses. Occasion will be taken in another part of this address to describe the attitude of the Republican press respecting the principal measure enacted during the Harding administration, the Fordney-McCumber tariff law.

LEGISLATIVE RECORDS COMPARED.

"It is impossible completely to compare in a single address the legislative records of the Democratic Party during the Wilson administration and the Republican Party during the Harding administration. The Democrats gave to the Nation a series of measures of recognized vital importance to the commerce and industry of the Nation. These laws are definitive of that progressive spirit which marked the principles and policies of the last two Democratic administrations, and of the great Democratic leader, Woodrow Wilson. Reactionary influences may diminish the effectiveness of these measures; misrepresentation and propaganda conceived and conducted for selfish purposes may, for a time, decrease their popularity. No power can bring about the repeal of the policies established in the Federal reserve banking act, the farm loan, trade commission, Federal road aid, and revenue measures, outstanding achievements of Democratic control. Any one of these laws readily might be made the sole subject matter of a complete address. In these remarks references to many of them must, therefore, be brief and general.

FEDERAL RESERVE ACT—DECEMBER 23, 1913.

"The feebleness and inefficiency of our national currency and banking system prior to the passage of the Federal reserve act is universally admitted. The great Democratic measure which based our national currency on assets rather than on liabilities and made it responsive to the conservative demands of business has become a model for government finance. Money panics no longer threaten. Under proper administration the Federal reserve banking act will continue as a bulwark against dishonest manipulation of the national finance machinery by speculators.

"The Federal reserve act is the most important and beneficial statute enacted by Congress during the last 50 years. It must not be perverted for the depression of agriculture or other industries through arbitrary deflation or denial of credits.

FARM LOAN ACT—JULY 17, 1916.

"Scarcely less important than the reserve bank law is the farm loan act, which is designed to mobilize agricultural credits and reduce interest rates on loans to farmers. The measure represents the foundation stone in a superstructure yet to be completed. The present administration, while recognizing the necessity for additional measures, particularly provision for short-time credits on agricultural assets, has proven incompetent to frame and enact the necessary legislation. The administration has pursued a policy that has impaired the usefulness of this law in relieving borrowers from the exactions and extortions of private loan companies by unduly restricting loans by the Federal farm land banks.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ACT—SEPTEMBER 8, 1916.

"The wholesome character of the Federal Trade Commission act may be tested by the bitterness with which it has been assailed. The Trade Commission was created to prevent unfair competition in industry. The gigantic trusts and combinations which extort excessive profits from American consumers have, in every instance, opposed the effective execution of the Trade Commission law. For a time there were open threats on the part of Republicans to abolish the commission, but these threats have been silenced, and the policy of repeal apparently has been abandoned because of the numerous cases in which the commission has demonstrated its usefulness in the public interest.

FEDERAL ROAD POLICY.

"Realizing the relationship of highways to modern business prosperity, the Democratic Party established a policy of Federal aid in the construction of highways which has promoted universal interest in road building, and which will finally result in a complete system of national highways.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION ACT—FEBRUARY 23, 1917.

"In the long list of legislative achievements in which Democrats justly may take pride is the vocational training act. Its influence in raising the standard of American citizenship and increasing the efficiency of American workmen, its benefits to soldiers, sailors, and ex-service men are generally recognized.

"For lack of time let me merely mention, without discussion, other important measures enacted during President Wilson's administrations. These include agricultural extension, immigration, war risk insurance, soldiers' compensation, service men's civil rights acts, the armed neutrality act, the draft law, Liberty loan measures, and many others—some of them being passed without political division and with practical unanimity.

FISCAL MEASURES AND POLICIES CONTRASTED.

"The revenue policies of the Democratic Party, particularly during the war period, were necessary and justified. They imposed high taxes, especially in the form of excess profits and surtaxes on incomes. These tributes, though in large measure exacted from business rendered highly profitable because of the war, were not popular among those directly affected by them.

"It was easy for Republicans to arouse resentment against the Democratic Party in the campaign of 1920 on account of taxes alleged to be excessive, but when on March 4, 1921, the Republican Party became charged with the responsibility of promptly relieving the public of the tax burdens, the task appeared impossible of accomplishment and was abandoned in so far as it involved general public relief. The repeal of excess-profits taxes, the reduction of surtaxes on large incomes, and the proposal to enact a sales tax quickly brought disappointment and aroused anxiety. The Republican policy of relieving war profiteers and others enjoying excessive profits from a burden of approximately $450,000,000 and of shifting it to the consumers of the Nation in the form of a sales tax became so unpopular that the latter was abandoned. Already from a position of exalted popular favor the party had descended to a plane where it was compelled to encounter attacks on account of general business depression, falling prices in agricultural products, continued high costs of living, no relief from tax burdens, on the contrary threatened increases, and general incompetence in the administration of public affairs.

THE BUDGET A DEMOCRATIC MEASURE.

"The principal subject matter of boastfulness on the part of Republican leaders is the establishment and operations of the Budget.

"It will be remembered that President Wilson recommended to Congress a budget plan under which revenues would be coordinated with expenditures so that deficits might be avoided in the future.

"Spitefulness prompted the Republican Congress to inject into the measure a provision clearly unconstitutional. It deliberately infringed upon the constitutional authority of the President to make appointments, and for this reason President Wilson rightfully vetoed the bill, notwithstanding he had urged upon the Congress the enactment of budget legislation.

"While the budget system was thus proposed by a Democratice President, for the reason stated it was not enacted into law until the Harding administration. Whatever beneficial results may be derived from the adoption of the Budget, it can not be claimed as distinctively a Republican Party measure, for it was first proposed by a Democratic President, and its defeat was accomplished through the malicious adoption of a provision designed to embarrass the President by deliberately seeking to abridge his constitutional authority.

"While the Budget has been instrumental in providing a restraint on appropriations, because it furnishes a method of partially coordinating Government expenditures with income, it has not resulted in the adoption of that radical and wholesome economy in the national expenses which conditions justify and which public opinion requires. A comparison of the running expenses of the Government, eliminating all war costs and expenditures, for the years 1915 and 1923 shows an increase of $536,000,000 under President Harding's administration over President Wilson's administration. This comparison takes into account only appropriations for the executive departments and does not include appropriations for the Emergency Fleet Corporation, $100,000,000; Veterans' Bureau, $418,000,000; United States Housing Corporation, $1,000,000; Alien Property Custodian, $370,000,000; Internal Revenue and Public Debt Service, $43,000,000; bonus to employees, $38,000,000; public debt funds, $1,260,000,000; Federal reserve bank franchise tax and debt retirements, $30,000,000.

"The expenses for the ordinary Government operations, eliminating all war costs, for the year 1923 will exceed $1,329,423,000, as against $793,064,000 for 1915, a difference of $536,000,000 in favor of Democratic economy contrasted with Republican extravagance.

"The tariff legislation sponsored by the present administration illustrates the abysmal folly into which the Republican Party has fallen.

THE EMERGENCY TARIFF ACT.

"In order to fallow the ground for the Fordney-McCumber tariff law, indefensible from every standpoint, the emergency tariff act levying high duties on importations of agricultural products was enacted as a temporary emergency expedient. Under this law, and in spite of it, the value of agricultural products as a rule has constantly declined, until one of the big problems confronting the United States is the continuance of production under conditions which will stabilize the fundamental industry of agriculture. With notable exceptions high tariff rates have always proved inoperative to maintain the prices of farm products, particularly as to those exported in excess of imports.

"The emergency tariff act, passed for the alleged benefit of farmers, was made by the leaders in Congress the justification for enormous increases in the tariff rates imposed on manufactured products.

THE FORDNEY-M'CUMBER TARIFF LAW.

"Wise tariff legislation was impossible under the conditions which existed while this law was being framed and considered by the Congress. Its passage in spite of disturbed and fluctuating conditions in domestic and foreign commerce is explained only on the ground that a campaign pledge to raise the tariff made to tariff profiteers and buccaneers in 1920 must be redeemed before the elections now near at hand in which the Republican Party may be repudiated and driven from power.

"The Democratic law in force, based in the main on scientific and competitive principles, was not designed to be an embargo. What the buccaneers sought was the erection of a tariff wall which would prevent substantial importations and enable them to plunder at will the consumers of commodities indispensable to health and comfort.

"From the beginning secrecy has surrounded the Fordney-McCumber tariff law. The vicious custom of denying minority members of the Ways and Means Committee in the House and of the Finance Committee in the Senate participation in the framing of the measure was extended to the conference. Secrecy was preserved as to proceedings by which the most far-reaching changes in the measure were accomplished, in spite of the decisions of the House and Senate after prolonged debate.

THE SUGAR SCHEDULE.

"Under this Republican tariff law, enacted under conditions which made prohibitive rates and embargoes especially objectionable, even to those who favor the principle of tariff protection, the American people are required to pay a tax of $2.20 per 100 pounds on sugar imported, save that which may come in from Cuba, upon which the rate is $1.75 per 100 pounds. This is much higher than the rate fixed in the emergency tariff act. In that measure the corresponding figures are $2 and $1.60 per 100, respectively. This tribute levied from the consumers of an indispensable commodity, of which America produces only a small part of the amount consumed, is a striking illustration of the injustice and oppression of Republican tariff policies.

THE WOOL SCHEDULE.

"The conference agreement on the new tariff bill imposes a duty of 31 cents per pound on raw wool, which is, of course, reflected in compensatory duties and greatly increased rates on the manufactured products. The tax on woolen dress goods and cloth carries both a specific and an ad valorem duty ranging from 50 to 75 per cent ad valorem equivalent. The tax on woolen blankets, hosiery, sweaters, and gloves ranges from 50 to 100 per cent. It is estimated that the increased cost to American consumers of woolen goods under the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill over the Simmons-Underwood Act will approximate $200,000,000.

MANUFACTURES OF COTTON.

"The cotton schedule is equally indefensible. The ad valorem rate on sewing thread is from 20 to 35 per cent; on cotton cloth from 30 to 45 per cent; on quilts or bedspreads, 40 per cent; gloves, 25 per cent to 75 per cent; hose and half hose from 30 to 50 per cent; knit underwear, 45 per cent.

MERCILESS INCREASE OF TARIFF—TAX TO HOUSEHOLDERS.

"The bill contemplates a merciless increase of taxes on cutlery, household and kitchen utensils, machinery, and tools.

"The rate on table and kitchen articles of glass is 55 per cent; on vitrified ware from 60 to 70 per cent; on white granite and semiporcelain earthenware and stoneware from 45 to 50 per cent.

"The bill takes hemp, flax, and jute from the free list and imposes high rates of duty upon all articles manufactured from them, including twine and cotton bagging.

HEAVY DUTY ON POTASH.

"Not satisfied with taxing everything which the American farmer consumes in his home, this bill in the interest of the Fertilizer Trust levies a duty of 1½ cents per pound on potash, which will increase the cost of fertilizer to the American farmer approximately $15 per ton. Farm organizations, business men's associations, and other influential bodies protested this tax as oppressive and outrageous; but the Fertilizer Trust possessed sufficient influence to force the tax on potash back into the bill after the Senate by an overwhelming vote had stricken it out.

"The Fordney-McCumber tariff bill is deservedly the most unpopular tariff law ever passed.

"The metropolitan press, including the most prominent Republican newspapers, have almost universally condemned it as violative of the principles of legitimate tariff protection and destructive of foreign commerce and domestic industry. Scarcely a publication of national reputation has attempted to defend this legislative monstrosity, which unnecessarily increases the cost of living, and at the same time paralyzes our foreign commerce.

ATTEMPT TO GIVE THE PRESIDENT POWER TO FIX DUTIES.

"An especially vicious feature of the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill is the provision which seeks to empower the President to change the duties prescribed in the law and to fix new and increased or reduced rates to be collected.

EXECUTIVE-MADE RATES UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

"The Federal Constitution vests in the Congress the sole power to fix tariff duties. It is a fundamental principle of constitutional government that the taxing power shall be guarded against encroachment by the executive, and that this great power shall be exercised by the legislative department. Under this new Republican tariff law, soon to take effect, a capricious or misinformed Executive, through raising or lowering tariff rates on imports 50 per cent, could injure the Nation's commerce and vex and disturb domestic business at a cost to the public which can not be estimated or approximated. By a simple proclamation, changing rates imposed from the foreign valuation to the American valuation, the President could increase 25 per cent the duties imposed by Congress. It is no answer to say Presidents will exercise this power cautiously and in the public interest. The Constitution forbids the levying of taxes by the Executive, and no strained construction of its provisions can overcome the traditional policy among English-speaking peoples of confining control of the purse strings, both as to revenues and appropriations, to the legislative authority.

THE POSTPONEMENT OF SHIP-SUBSIDY LEGISLATION.

"Shortly after his inauguration, President Harding championed a ship-subsidy bill, which he said would establish and maintain the supremacy of American shipping. This bill in its practical effects would surrender to private control ships and other property which cost $3,000,000,000 for the trivial sum of $200,000,000.

"It would levy tribute from the American people as a whole in order to subsidize and promote private investments. The partisan press, supporting President Harding, announced that he had assumed leadership in national political affairs with a boldness and determination which challenged admiration and invited the heartiest cooperation. Republican Congressmen and Senators from the Middle West and West, whose constituents are opposed to the President's ship subsidy bill, hurled defiance at their leader, and drove him to the humiliation of consenting that the ship-subsidy legislation shall be postponed until after the November elections.

VACILLATING ATTITUDE OF ADMINISTRATION ON ADJUSTED COMPENSATION.

"In its 1920 platform and in the campaign following the Republican Party committed itself to adjusted-compensation legislation. A bill was brought forward to equalize in part the striking contrast in the liberal compensation paid civilian laborers during the war, and the trivial financial reward given our soldiers and sailors who sacrificed their business interests and prospects and risked their lives in the Nation's service. With characteristic indecision the administration vacillated on this measure from support to opposition.

"The President threatened to veto it unless the law carried means for meeting the financial obligations which it created. This rule has not been applied to any other measure of national and general importance, either in peace or during war. In order to minimize the President's objections to the bill, and thus reduce the probability that it will be vetoed, its friends modified the measure so as to impose the least possible burden on the immediate future. The President and his advisors are willing to subsidize American shipping, at the approximate cost of $750,000,000 during the next 10 years. In amazing contrast they have thrown every possible obstacle in the way of adjusted compensation for the soldiers and sailors who saved civilization.

CORRUPT OR EXCESSIVE EXPENDITURES IN CAMPAIGNS.

"The decision by a bare majority in the Newberry case confirming his title to a seat in the Senate obtained by the expenditure of a quarter of a million dollars contributed by the family and intimate friends of the candidate illustrates the indifference of the present administration to the protection of the sanctity and integrity of the ballot.

"State officers and others were hired, newspapers were subsidized, accounts were falsified, and expenditures suppressed in a campaign which prominent Republicans and newspapers denounced as corrupt and nauseating. The national administration exerted every possible influence in behalf of Mr. NEWBERRY, with the result that his title was confirmed, to the amazement of everyone who advocates decency in politics and to the disgust of many prominent Republicans, both in the Senate and in private life, who are unwilling to countenance corruption to promote partisan ends.

ABSURD EFFORT OF REPUBLICAN CONGRESS TO HOLD COLORED VOTE IN LINE.

"The proceedings in Congress relative to the Liberian loan and the Federal antilynching bill suggest an absurdly manifest effort to hold in line the colored vote in the elections near at hand.

"On the eve of adjournment the Liberian loan bill, authorizing this Government to loan $5,000,000 to the Republic of Liberia, is brought forward for consideration in the Senate. Its advocates justify the measure on an alleged moral obligation growing out of the declaration of war against Germany by Liberia. The fight on the bill is being led by that gallant free-lance Republican, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. He has the support of a few of his party colleagues. The effort to pass the bill is nothing less than a political move designed to increase the prospects of securing for Republican candidates the vote of colored citizens in sympathy with Liberia. The Senator from Idaho and others have demonstrated conclusively that the Congress originally authorized the loan solely for war purposes, and that the Republic of Liberia declined to comply with the conditions prescribed for securing repayment; that for this reason the credit was withdrawn and the loan never made. For the purpose of paying certain claims due France and Great Britain and others held by American capitalists and speculators—some of the claims having been bought for comparatively trivial sums—and for the further purpose of rehabilitating Liberia, it is proposed to take $5,000,000 in taxes from the American people. An army of officers at high salaries is to be created to administer the loan. Many Republican Senators and Representatives who denounced the adjusted compensation bill as an alleged 'raid on the Treasury' and as 'commercializing patriotism' are cordially supporting the Liberian loan bill.

FEDERAL ANTILYNCHING BILL.

'Another false pretense by which the Republicans in Congress seek to conciliate colored citizens and secure their favor in the approaching election is the Dyer antilynching bill. It proceeds on the theory that the illegal and criminal action of a mob, in violence of local law and local authority, constitutes a denial of the equal protection of the laws secured to every American citizen by the thirteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution.

"It provides for the imposition of penalties on counties where lynchings occur or through which persons lynched may be transported, however innocent the population of these counties as a whole or local authorities may be of complicity in the lynching. Lynchings are unlawful under the constitutions and statutes of all the States, and they should be punished without compromise, with promptness and severity, just as unlawful homicides in other cases of rioting should be punished. Congress has no power to enact criminal laws or enforce police regulations for the States. Lawyers generally regard the Dyer bill as not within the powers of Congress to enact and few have attempted to argue its validity. The bill was never intended to pass. It is brought forward in the Senate when Congress is about to adjourn for the purpose of making colored voters believe there is a hearty sincere purpose to enact its provisions into law, when the real object is to secure their gratitude and consequently their support in the elections.

RAILWAY AND COAL STRIKES.

"Wage controversies in both the anthracite and the bituminous coal fields culminated in strikes April 1, 1922, which completely closed down the anthracite industry and reduced production in the bituminous fields.

"The country was thus brought face to face with a threatened coal famine. The President attempted without success to settle both strikes. His efforts were not exerted until the coal strikes had been in progress for several months. Intervention in the earlier stages of the contest and tactful negotiations alone could have effected satisfactory settlement. The public are unfortunate in being compelled to bear the discomfort and inconvenience and loss resulting from these industrial disturbances.

THE SHOPMEN'S STRIKE AND THE DAUGHERTY INJUNCTION.

"The railway shopmen's strike, which from the beginning threatened to interrupt prompt and efficient transportation by railroads, began July 1 and continued for more than two months with no effort on the part of the administration to bring about a settlement. The President at last volunteered to act as a mediator, and proposed a plan for settlement which the laborers accepted but which the executives refused. The plan contemplated immediate resumption of labor by the shopmen with their seniority unimpaired; that in the future both employees and railroad managers shall obey the decisions of the Labor Board, and rehearing by that tribunal of the decision reducing wages which in part had caused the strike. The railroads having rejected this plan because they wanted the precedent established and maintained that seniority shall be forfeited by employees who strike, the President reversed the proposal and suggested that the shopmen go back to work at once and submit both controversies to the Labor Board. This they promptly refused, and thereupon Attorney General Daugherty instituted an injunction proceeding in the Federal court at Chicago of the most comprehensive and sweeping character ever known. The shopmen and their sympathizers were enjoined from every peaceful act that may be performed in connection with a strike—from meeting and discussing acceptance or abandonment of railway employment, from publishing interviews in newspapers and otherwise, from arguing the justice of their cause, from even expressing to others their confidence in the merit of the shopmen's opposition to the Labor Board's decision reducing wages. This injunction was issued after the railway managers and executives claimed all necessity for Government interference had passed. It clearly exceeds the constitutional power of the court which issued it, and is a restraint upon the freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and the right peaceably to assemble guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. Strikers have no more right to commit crime than other citizens, and if they violate the laws they should be punished for their criminal acts. It is not criminal, however, for laborers concertedly to oppose wage reductions or to advocate wage increases. The cause of law and order will not be promoted, discontent will not be allayed, justice will not be administered through the issuance of injunctions and restraining orders in excess of lawful authority.

"The refusal of the court to modify the injunction, and the continuance of it unchanged for even a short period in spite of the general opinion among lawyers that the process enjoins lawful as well as unlawful acts, is destructive of the reputation of the courts for integrity and impartiality indispensable to the administration of American justice.

DISCREDITABLE FOREIGN POLICY.

"As in domestic affairs, hesitation, confusion, and vacillation characterize the prevailing foreign policy, if the administration can be said to have one. The elections of 1920 are construed as committing the United States against membership in the League of Nations. That construction is generally submitted to or acquiesced in by Democrats, although many citizens, both Republicans and Democrats—and no issue is made in this campaign—still think that the United States should join the league, and in that way assist in promoting and preserving international peace and good will.

"In repudiating the League of Nations, President Harding in his campaign addresses repeatedly pledged the formation of an association of nations to promote world peace.

THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE ON THE WHOLE A FAILURE.

"The Washington conference, originally proposed solely to promote international disarmament, expanded its activities to many subjects of world importance. On the whole it proved a failure as an agency for stabilizing disturbed conditions and securing recognition of justice as the basis of international transactions.

"While the conference effected a reduction in capital-ship construction, it accomplished little in the cause of general disarmament. The general results of the proceedings were detrimental to the dignity, influence, and interests of the United States.

"Already reaction in the public mind has occurred, and the conviction is becoming quite general that the Washington conference was a distinct triumph for British and Japanese diplomats.

"First, it committed us to an alliance with the great military powers, France, Great Britain, and Japan, to the exclusion of other friendly nations.

"Second, through the treaties promulgated at the conference the Pacific possessions of this Government were left at the mercy of Japan.

"Third, the supremacy in the Orient of the Japanese Empire is recognized and permanently established as one of the results of the conference.

"Fourth, Japan may, without restraint, extend her possessions in the Orient and maintain supremacy in Siberia, Manchuria, Mongolia, Shantung, and Korea.

"Fifth, while the conference in practical effect committed us to acquiescence in Japanese aggressions, it also tended to isolate the United States from other nations, which were excluded from the four-power alliance, and, strangely but certainly, more firmly to group with the Japanese Empire France and Great Britain, whose interests and obligations committed them to Japanese policies before the Washington conference had convened.

"The spirit of the Anglo-Japanese alliance animates the four-power treaty. In conferences under the treaty the United States likely will find her representatives in a minority, standing alone against the representatives of the other three powers.

"The British Government, by its recent note to other allied governments, sought to complete the isolation of the United States from European nations. This note was prepared by the Earl of Balfour, the chief British diplomat and dominating factor at the Washington conference.

"With contemptible arrogance, the note places full responsibility upon the United States for the refusal of Great Britain to forgive debts due her by other allied nations on the theory that our Government has proved a hard creditor whose exactions have deprived the British of any opportunity for the display of generosity in dealing with her allies.

FOREIGN LOANS OF THE UNITED STATES.

"With characteristic selfishness and shrewdness, the British Government has conducted propaganda throughout the world to create sentiment in favor of the cancellation by this Government of foreign loans made during the war. Many American financiers have advocated cancellation because that method of sacrificing the public interest will promote their advantage by enabling them to collect private obligations from allied governments and their nationals.

"No reason based on sound policy can be offered why those nations financially able to pay should receive gifts from the people of this Government, and the administration has no right to tax American citizens for such purposes.

PARTISAN DEBT COMMISSION.

"To adjust and refund these foreign loans, Congress authorized the creation of a foreign debt commission, and the President appointed five Republicans as members. Not a single Democrat was named. Months have elapsed and no progress has been made. It is doubtful if anything is ever accomplished by the commission. Great Britain complainingly agrees to pay the interest on her loan, but she has capitalized the unpopularity of the United States among our foreign allies until we are condemned for selfishness and avarice and as totally lacking in sympathy and helpfulness.

"Democrats wrote into the bonus bill a provision which would have set at rest the agitation for cancellation and made certain the collection of foreign loans from all governments able to pay. We provided that the costs of the bonus should be paid from the interest on these loans.

"Only one vote in the Senate was cast in opposition, but the provision was quickly eliminated in conference. Many Senators and Representatives who voted against the adjusted compensation bill are in favor of canceling debts due the United States from foreign Governments.

"Discredited by foolish mistakes, indecision, and submission to the autocratic demands of selfish influences—isolated, duped, and overreached by shrewd and designing foreign diplomats—the administration has forfeited all claim to favor from the electors."

ADDRESS BY SENATOR RANSDELL.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD, in 8-point type, an address delivered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] before the Eighth National Exposition of Chemical Industries in New York City September 12, 1922.

Mr. SMOOT. That was not a political speech, was it?

Mr. DU PONT. No.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I have no objection to it being printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Delaware?

There being no objection, the speech referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, in 8-point type, as follows:

THE AGE OF CHEMISTRY AS VIEWED BY A SOUTHERNER.

Address of JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, United States Senator from Louisiana, before the Eighth National Exposition of Chemical Industries at New York City September 12, 1922.

We live in an age of chemistry, and this great science is growing more important every day. Chemistry made marvelous advance during the last century, especially the latter half, and placed all the arts and sciences under heavy tribute, none more so than medicine, war, the mineral world, and soil fertilization. A start, but in reality only a beginning, has been made in the study and application of chemistry to the myriad questions that confront the human race in its pursuit of life's problems. Many of the unknown things of nature have given up their secrets in the laboratories of chemists, but only the surface of the hidden world has been scratched, and an innumerable number of secrets are yet to be unveiled. Everything around us is filled with secrets—the earth with its emboweled wealth of minerals and its plant and animal life of every kind, including human beings; the sea with its waters, fishes, plants, and nameless treasures; the air that surrounds the globe—in fact, all nature as we haltingly comprehend it, and the magician's wand that is to lift the veil and make us see clearly things not dreamed of now or viewed darkly without understanding is to be waved by great chemists—most of whom I trust will be citizens of the United States. My chemist friends, a great future lies before you. In a special manner you are charged with the task of discovering nature's secrets and disclosing to a uniting world the great benefits which are in store for her children.

MUST DEVELOP CHEMISTRY IN AMERICA.

Chemical industry in the United States should be developed along the broadest and most comprehensive lines for several reasons which I will enumerate briefly.

A. Chemistry is essential to the successful prosecution of practically all the arts and sciences. Innumerable chemical products enter into the manufacture of textiles, iron, and steel, the entire list of minerals, fertilizer to increase soil productivity, many of the products of wood, all drugs and medicines, household arts, including that most essential of all—cooking—the ceremic arts, and glass. In fact, there is no art or industry of modern civilization which does not require the constant aid of chemistry to its successful application. Therefore we can not afford to be dependent upon the chemists of any other country and should develop every branch of the art in America.

B. The wonderful advance in chemical inventions and discoveries during the past century warrant us in believing that innumerable things are still hidden which will respond to intelligent, persistent effort on the part of chemists. Many of the diseases of man have been greatly ameliorated by chemical inventions and discoveries of recent years, such as asparin, novocaine, salvarsan, etc. Why can we not expect the discovery of remedies that will give relief, and possibly effect cures of such diseases as leprosy, cancer, pneumonia, tuberculosis, and others which afflict mankind so terribly? Our American chemists are quite as intelligent as the Germans; and if we encourage and help them during the next 50 years as effectively as Germany did her chemists during the last 50, we can expect equally good or better results, not only for the relief of human suffering but along commercial lines, and those of national defense.

C. It is unfortunate that nations of the world can not remain at peace and ignore all preparations for war, but so long as this greatly desired end seems still in the distant future it behooves wise men to prepare for possible conflict. Most thinkers agree that the next war will be decided by the chemical preparedness and foresight of the contestants, and that it will be a chemical war. Indeed, during the last two years of the recent World War chemistry played a most important part, and there is every reason to believe its part in the next war will be infinitely more important. There is the closest alliance between commercial and war chemistry. Chemical industries of commerce can be quickly and cheaply converted into producers of war chemicals. Many of the commodities of one are available for the other. America must be prepared thoroughly for strife if it should ever come again, and in order to be so, she must develop her chemical industries along commercial, everyday lines so that our people will become a Nation of chemists familiar with the science in every way and practicing it in their daily lives.

CHEMISTRY IN THE TARIFF.

When the chemical schedule of the pending tariff bill was under consideration I worked actively for a high protective duty on all chemical products, as I believed same to be essential to the proper development and maintenance of the industry in our country. In the course of my remarks in the Senate August 17 last I said: "The Germans, through their investigation of coal-tar products, have developed some marvelous remedies as an incident to the dye industry. They discovered and placed on the market salvarsan, which cures one of the most loathsome and terrible diseases that ever afflicted the human race. They discovered novocaine, one of the greatest deadeners of pain known to science, wonderful in that it is a nonhabit-forming drug, a most beneficial thing. Many other very helpful drugs have been developed by the efforts of the German chemists in connection with coal tar. I can not believe that the wise men of Germany have even scratched the surface of the possibilities of the coal-tar industry. Coal was made by the great chemist of nature, how many years ago none of us know, and in its manufacture everything that grows out of the ground, I imagine, was used—the most exquisite flowers, the sweetest balsams, the most healing plants and herbs of every kind and sort, and vast forests of giant trees. Coal furnishes more commodities for the use, health, and comfort of mankind than anything I know of. The wonderful violet and rose perfumes which our ladies use are manufactured from coal. Saccharine, which is five hundred times as sweet as sugar, is manufactured from coal. All the beautiful dyes we admire so much are manufactured from coal. I could tell about many wonderful things, but have not time nor opportunity to do so."

These statements seem so pertinent I trust you will pardon me for quoting them.

AMERICA SHOULD PRODUCE ALL ITS CHEMICALS.

In urging highly developed chemical industries along all practical lines I must not be understood as advising them to produce more than a fair supply for the 120,000,000 people of the continental United States and the 12,000,000 additional who live under our flag outside the continent—an aggregate of 132,000,000, to which may be added the 2,890,000 of Cuba, as we enjoy preferential trade with that country, a total of 134,890,000. These are enough people to support vast chemical plants, doing an immense business. These industries should be satisfied with producing enough for home folks and those who form a constituent part of the Nation, and not make the fatal mistake of tremendous overproduction, which caused Germany to fight the world eight years ago and wrought her destruction. There is no better market on earth for any and every thing of real value than the United States, and if our chemical manufacturers can secure and retain that market by the high quality of their products, with the aid of the tariff, they should be satisfied.

OUR CHEMISTS MUST NOT TRY TO MONOPOLIZE WORLD TRADE.

It should be no part of our program to run the rest of the nations out of business or off the world's markets. The great duty which confronts us is one of giving proper consideration to the vast undeveloped resources we have within our borders and to rid ourselves of dependence upon other nations for chemical products the raw materials and facilities for the manufacture of which we possess in unparalleled proportions and which lie dormant for the want of a little encouragement to home talent and industry. My position is simply this: We have under our flag this vast supply of raw material, and we have also 134,890,000 people who constitute a ready market for the finished products; therefore it is only logical that we should manufacture under our flag the things which we use. We should have neither the time nor the disposition to speculate on world monopoly, for we are not even supplied at home with many of the essential products, and as time goes on we expect to let the natural laws of supply and demand take care of any surplus we may have. Beyond question there will be markets abroad for many of our commodities, just as we purchase from other lands quantities of foreign products, such as nitrates, sugar, coffee, tea, raw silk, rubber, textiles, sisal, wood pulp, etc. I strongly favor reciprocal trade with other countries. We can not afford to live and move and have our being in the United States alone, but must participate actively in world commerce. My suggestion is merely intended as a caution against too much expansion in manufactures, with the consequent attempt to capture the foreign markets. We must carry out in theory and practice the idea that people of other nations are entitled to a square deal in all our relations with them and not attempt to force on them surplus articles which greed has induced us to produce.

CHEMICAL POSSIBILITIES OF THE SOUTH.

Having stated these general principles, I now wish to refer in detail to some chemical possibilities of the South, particularly of my own State, Louisiana. In the course of a brief address I can merely mention a few of the most important, but enough, I trust, to show some of the real wonders of Dixie land, which I fear are not fully appreciated.

For three generations the South has led the world in the production of turpentine and rosin. From the beginning of the naval stores industry southern pineries have contributed practically 100 per cent of the turpentine and rosin used in the United States. In addition those forests have supplied for export an amount greater than the naval stores exports of all other nations combined. The long leaf and slash pines of the South, which are the sources of approximately $40,000,000 worth of turpentine and rosin annually, also rank as first-grade structural timbers, and their wood is convertible into a great variety of by-products, including industrial alcohol, pulp and paper, pine oils, etc. The life of this wood is more than doubled when treated with the common chemical, creosote. The length of the fibers of southern pines makes them capable of producing an unusually strong and tough pulp, from which high-quality kraft, or wrapping paper, is made.

The Forest Service made quite extensive tests some years ago on the suitability of long-leaf pine for paper pulp. There are now in the South several commercial plants making kraft paper. The possibility of using southern pine and red gum for the production of high-grade book and magazine paper has been demonstrated in recent trials at the Forest Products Laboratory of the Forest Service, Madison, Wis.

Book paper requires for its manufacture two kinds of woods, a long-fibered wood such as spruce, to impart strength, and some short-fibered wood to give the formation and finish and other printing qualities. The southern pines are long-fibered woods, but their pitch content and difficulty of bleaching have heretofore been obstacles in the way of their use for white paper. It has been shown that these obstacles can be overcome in a large measure by proper cooking conditions and improved bleaching methods. Red gum is typical of the many southern hardwoods that might be used with the pines in the manufacture of the better grades of printing paper.

The utilization of the southern pines and red gum for book paper would spread the burden of the pulp-wood supply over considerable territory which is favored with a large annual growth of timber. Although the bulk of the standing timber in the United States is in the far West, the principal part of the annual growth is now in the South. Pines and hardwoods are distributed through the Southern States in proportions well suited for the manufacture of book paper, and the forests are near the centers of paper consumption as well as the supplies of coal, oil, sulphur, and other necessary raw materials.

SOUTHERN SAWMILL WASTE WOULD MAKE ALL OUR PAPER.

The present waste from the sawmills of the South offers an enormous source of raw material for the manufacture of paper. The possibilities of this waste are difficult to realize. It is a potential source of alcohol, both wood alcohol and ethyl or grain alcohol, of turpentine and rosin, and of kraft and book paper. Under present methods of manufacturing lumber, at least half of the wood in the log goes to waste in the form of saw kerf, slabs, trimmings, edgings, etc. Since the lumber production of the South is something over 10,000,000,000 feet annually, this means that at least 10,000,000,000 feet of sawmill waste is possible raw material for the manufacture of paper pulp or for other purposes. This 10,000,000,000 feet of sawmill waste wood is a greater amount than is now used for the manufacture of all the paper used in the United States. In addition, there is a waste of limbs and tree tops quite as large as the sawmill waste. It is commonly estimated that a thousand feet board measure is equal to 2 cords of wood. On this basis a sawmill waste of 10,000,000,000 feet would be equivalent to 20,000,000 cords of wood, and that from limbs and tops of trees to another 20,000,000 cords, while our total consumption in the United States for the year 1920, including all imports from Canada and other countries, was only 6,100,000 cords of wood. It is thus evident that the sawmill wastage of 20,000,000 cords much more than equals the total paper consumption in the United States, including all newsprint, without considering the waste left in the woods.

To show how important it is to utilize at least a part of this waste, the paper and pulp trade of the United States paid out in 1920 for pulp wood, wood pulp, and paper imported the sum of $191,077,976. Of course, much of the material can not be used at present because it is scattered and costly to collect. However, the immense field for saving and the possibilities of the pulp and paper industry in the South are evident, and they furnish many and most promising problems for chemists. Not only trained foresters but trained chemical engineers must deal with forestry in all its branches, including the myriads of pine stumps filled with rosin and turpentine now going to decay on 50,000,000 acres of cut-over lands, as it advances to a more stable permanent position in this country. Louisiana is practicing reforestation in a rather large way, and so intelligently that for several years the Yale School of Forestry has sent its students to study in the new forests of that State. If close technical attention is not given to the industry we will soon reach a point where the forests of the South will be almost altogether unproductive.

GREAT VARIETY OF POTENTIAL CHEMICALS IN THE SOUTH.

Phosphate and sulphuric acid, two of the principal ingredients which go into the manufacture of fertilizer, a product so essential for the growing of crops, are obtained in the South in the greatest abundance, and we export a large quantity of phosphates. The largest sulphuric acid plant in the world is located at Ducktown, Tenn. Although the South now produces more than half of the fertilizer made in the United States, with a bright future for rapid growth of the industry, improved methods for the mining of phosphate rock and the necessary elimination of waste are needed to reduce the cost of this product, which is of such great importance to agriculture. The much-needed potash, of which we import vast quantities, is a by-product of the blast furnace and the manufacture of cement, and should by all means be developed to the greatest extent in our country. In addition to these, I need only mention the South's practical monopoly of bauxite for the manufacture of aluminum, its tremendous stores of petroleum, gas, silica, salt, sulphur, iron, coal, limestone, barytes, quartz, zinc, manganese, lead, nickel, lignite, and so forth, some of which are being partially utilized and others are awaiting development. The South possesses over 70 per cent of the coking coal of the country, and at least one-half its iron ore. Cotton is another resource over which the South has an absolute monopoly, producing from ten to twelve million bales per year. This gives an inexhaustible supply of cellulose and its numerous products. Incidentally, there is also obtained from cotton about 3,000,000 tons of seed annually, worth from $40 to $50 per ton in the raw state. This seed is worked in several hundred oil mills under chemical direction and furnishes many articles used in daily life, as cottonseed oil, hogless lard, hard fats, soap, glycerin, margarin, cattle feed, fertilizer, and others.

VAST SUPPLY OF HYDRAULIC POWER.

Whenever capital and initiative are directed toward placing the many available products of the South on the market they will find at their command as motive power the 5,000,000 potential horsepower of southern streams, and the vast supplies of oil, coal, and gas which are in close proximity to most of the raw materials, together with competent labor, and on the whole, an agreeable people to work among.

At Muscle Shoals, on the Tennessee River, is a giant plant erected as a war measure at a cost of more than a hundred millions to extract nitrogen from the air for use in combustibles. The potential horsepower of the river in this vicinity, which is now being harnessed by the Government, is the greatest in the Union and a national asset of immense value if properly used. This power should be utilized primarily to manufacture nitrogen and its compounds for fertilizing the Nation's soils and cheapening farm products. Such use would make us independent of Chile for nitrate and give military insurance of the highest value. Every good American should try to see that this great asset is not wasted but is made to serve in the best possible way.

LOUISIANA'S WONDERFUL ADVANTAGES FOR CHEMICAL INDUSTRIES.

Permit me now to call your particular attention to the extremely generous provision which nature has made to my State. In Louisiana we have nine great basic raw materials of chemical industries in close proximity—salt, sulphur, limestone, clay, petroleum, gas, lignite, cotton, and wool. Sulphur and salt are found in the greatest abundance, almost chemically pure, within 75 miles of each other, connected by navigable waters, and gas is plentiful in the same section. The importance of these minerals needs no explanation at my hands before this convention, as the products which come from them are familiar to all of you. Suffice it to mention a few, such as sodium carbonate, bleaching powder, sulphuric acid, sodium hydroxide, chlorine, hydrochloric acid, washing soda, baking soda, and carbon bisulphide. In the northern section is the world's largest gas field, which furnishes fuel so cheap that it costs less than coal would at $1 per ton. Limestone of the finest quality in exhaustless quantities is found in the center of the State. Therefore, with this cheap fuel and the clay which is also found in this section, there is no reason why cement factories should not find this a most advantageous location, as the rapid building of roads in Louisiana offers a most excellent market for cement. Potentially, our gas fields are the Niagara Falls of Louisiana. In addition to gas, Louisiana ranks fourth in the Union as a producer of petroleum. One of the greatest chemical industries in America is the Standard Oil Refinery at Baton Rouge, La., 200 miles up the Mississippi. Great ships convey crude oil from Mexico to this refinery, which has a big fleet of vessels distributing its products throughout the world. This plant refines 50,000 barrels of crude oil daily and will increase the capacity to 60,000 barrels in the near future. Lignite is very plentiful but has not been carefully studied, hence I can say nothing definite about it. New Orleans is the second cotton port in America, and our supply of cellulose is limitless. The forests of the South, and especially of Louisiana, have been discussed in detail. It would seem on the face of things that great chemical industries would naturally spring up at the source of so much raw material and cheap power. The development of this territory is only in its infancy. In many of the wide-awake cities and towns of the State factory sites are being offered free of charge to any company that will come in and establish its industry.

COMMANDING POSITION GEOGRAPHICALLY.

In addition to the natural resources of Louisiana, she is situated in a most advantageous geographical position because of the Mississippi River and her proximity to the Tropics, South America, and the Panama Canal. Products—mineral, vegetable, and animal—from the west coast of the United States, South America, Central America, and the West Indies find their natural gateway into the Union through the great portal of the Mississippi. Deep-draft ocean vessels can carry their cargoes 250 miles from the Gulf to cities and factories on either bank of the mighty river and return with commerce for any part of the world. The Mississippi and the splendid rivers which connect with it furnish excellent and economical highways of transportation for the raw materials and finished products of chemical industries on their banks, and efficient railroads supplement them with their lines extending in every direction throughout the State and Nation.

Southern labor is comparatively cheap, plentiful, and above all is not Bolshevik in character. The workingman requires fewer clothes and less housing than in the North, and his food is to some extent grown at home. These, together with the cheap lumber and building materials, reflect very appreciably in the final cost of production to the manufacturer.

The South will welcome the scientist or chemical engineer in his efforts along any one or more of the numerous lines of his great profession, and he will make a mistake if he does not thoroughly investigate the wonderful industrial resources which nature has provided in that favored region.

The land of Dixie offers innumerable opportunities to men of brains and energy, and no part thereof has superior advantages to Louisiana. I unhesitatingly invite any chemist or chemical engineer who is seeking to better his condition, or any capitalist looking for good investment, to examine carefully the Louisiana field before locating elsewhere. A hospitable welcome will greet him and fine prospects in many lines.

AMERICA HOLDS TORCH TO MANKIND.

In conclusion, why should not American chemists lead the world and set the pace for mankind by the practical, effective use in chemical industries of many discoveries known but not used, and by numerous other beneficial inventions in this most important and practical of all the sciences? America has certainly led the nations for a century and a half in promoting the doctrines of human freedom and the rights of all men to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness without let or hindrance from any source. God grant these glorious teachings may never be forgotten, but ever be practiced by all our citizens.

An artist in France gave the United States a wonderful Statue of Liberty, enlightening the world, and the torch of Bartholdi shines over our deliberations at this moment. It is symbolic of America's great mission to humanity—the making of a better world. We can make the world better by making America better, and our first duty is to America. Leaders in chemistry, as in business and finance, should heed the slogan, "Develop America first," but develop it along liberal common-sense lines with due regard to the rights of other nations and full recognition of the principle that all men are brothers.

Let all of us, and especially you, my chemist friends, strive with our whole might to maintain the noble principles on which our Republic was founded, and which have guided it thus far on the troubled sea of national life.

MASONIC MUTUAL RELIEF ASSOCIATION OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BALL. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 11116) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill the title of which has been stated by him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let the bill be read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill for information.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended, be amended by striking out the words "The Masonic Mutual Life Association of the District of Columbia" and substituting therefor the words "Acacia Mutual Life Association" as the name of the association, so that as amended it shall read "Acacia Mutual Life Association."

That sections 2, 3, 4, and 5 of such act be amended to read as follows:

SEC. 2. COMPENSATION OF WORLD WAR VETERANS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the message from the House on the soldiers' compensation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
September 14, 1922.

Resolved, That the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10874) entitled "An act to provide adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War, and for other purposes."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the Senator desires to take up the conference report, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Liberian joint resolution is temporarily laid aside.

Mr. McCUMBER. On behalf of the conferees I present the conference report which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota presents the conference report on the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill, which will be read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10874) to provide adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 47, and 68.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 46, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 63, 64, 65, 66, and 67, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"(b) Such application shall be made on or before January 1, 1928, and if not made on or before such date shall be held void."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 45: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 45, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 510. The certificate shall be canceled (a) if the veteran fails to redeem his certificate before its maturity, or (b) if he is in default upon any amount due in respect to a loan secured by the certificate and such default continues to his death."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 61: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Omit the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment; and on page 25, line 8, of the House bill strike out "Title VIII.—Land"; and on page 37 of the House bill make the following changes: Line 7, strike out "IX" and insert "VIII"; line 8, strike out "901" and insert "801"; and on page 38 of the House bill make the following changes: Line 6, strike out "902" and insert "802"; line 11, strike out "903" and insert "803"; line 17, strike out "904" and insert "804"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 62: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 62, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Omit the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

P. J. McCUMBER,
GEO. P. McLEAN,
F. M. SIMMONS,
DAVID I. WALSH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. W. FORDNEY,
W. R. GREEN,
NICHOLAS LONGWORTH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, is that motion debatable?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not debatable in the morning hour.

Mr. ASHURST. It is not a debatable motion, as I understand.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is not debatable.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. If a point of order is to be made against this conference report, should it be made now or can it be made later?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that a point of order can be made against the report at any time before the consideration in fact begins. It can not be made after the consideration in fact begins.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, Mr. President, I want to reserve a point of order——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is this simply a motion to take up the report?

Mr. McCUMBER. My motion is a motion simply to proceed to the consideration of the report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand the parliamentary situation, Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota has moved to take up the report for consideration. I do not see how a point of order can lie until the report is before the Senate for consideration. As soon as it comes before the Senate for consideration, it seems to me it is subject to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is precisely what the Chair has ruled.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There may have been some misunderstanding as to the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair may have expressed himself awkwardly, but he intends to hold that the point of order can be made after the conference report is before the Senate for consideration, but that it can not be made after the Senate has actually entered upon its consideration.

Mr. ASHURST. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I want to make the point of order now, then, so that we will not have any question about whether or not it is made in time. In making the point of order, I may say that I am as strong an advocate of this adjusted compensation bill as anyone.

I make the point of order against this conference report in that the House and the Senate conferees eliminated the provision touching reclamation and irrigation when the House had adopted an irrigation proposition and the Senate had adopted an irrigation proposition, and that the conferees have exceeded their authority in eliminating the whole proposition with respect to reclamation, irrigation, and land settlement.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, my understanding is that we have not yet voted upon the question of whether or not the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of the conference report. Until the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the conference report it would seem to me that no point of order could be raised concerning the report, because the report is not before the Senate for consideration until the Senate agrees to its consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. The report has been presented to the Senate, though.

Mr. McCUMBER. It has been presented.

Mr. HARRISON. And there is a motion pending now to proceed to its consideration. I do not want to lose the right to make the point of order. That is why I have made it at this time.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think the Senator would lose that right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has stated that in his opinion a point of order can be made after the motion of the Senator from North Dakota prevails, if it does prevail, but that it must be made immediately after the Senate enters upon the consideration of the report.

Mr. HARRISON. I withhold the point of order for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the conference report, which will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the conference report; and the Chair recognizes the Senator from Mississippi, if he desires to make a point of order.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi has yielded to me. I ask recognition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to say, however, that if the point of order is to be made it must be made at this time.

Mr. ASHURST. I rise for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the conference report on the bill proposing adjusted compensation for ex-service men having just been laid before the Senate, I hereby make, under Rule XXVII of the Rules of the Senate, and especially under paragraph 2 of said Rule XXVII, which paragraph is commonly called the Curtis rule, the following point of order, to wit: That the said conferees have omitted and have stricken from the bill and from this report matter agreed to by both Houses in this, Mr. President, to wit:

As the bill passed the House of Representatives there was in it and made a part thereof, known as Title VIII, a provision for land settlement and reclamation. The Senate struck out that provision, and in lieu thereof substituted the so-called McNary reclamation bill, so that when the bill went to conference both of the Houses had agreed to matter respecting and providing for and legislating upon land settlement and reclamation.

I will ask the Secretary and the Public Printer to have the matter I herewith submit printed in parallel columns, so that it may readily be ascertained what was the matter agreed to by both Houses.

RECLAMATION AND SETTLEMENT OF LANDS BY IRRIGATION, DRAINAGE, AND OTHER METHODS OF DEVELOPMENT AND IMPROVEMENT.

As it passed the Senate the bill provided for reclamation of lands by drainage, irrigation, and dikage. Both of the Houses agreed to matter relating to reclamation, irrigation, drainage, and dikage.

ROAD BUILDING.

As it passed the House there was a provision in the bill for road building. As it passed the Senate there was no provision on that subject.

IMPROVEMENT OF RECLAIMED LANDS.

As the bill passed the House it provided: Reclaimed land may be improved by the Government. As the bill passed the Senate it provided: Reclaimed land to be improved by the owners.

Matter upon which both of the Houses agreed.

RECLAMATION PROJECTS, EACH STATE.

As it passed the House the bill provided for one or more projects in each State, where feasible.

As it passed the Senate the bill provided for projects subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

LOANS TO SOLDIERS.

No loans were provided for in the bill as it passed the Senate. No loans were provided for in the bill as it passed the House upon these lands.

OFFICERS TO ADMINISTER RECLAMATION.

As the bill passed the House, board of five members and Secretary of the Interior, and four to be appointed by the President, to administer the act.

As it passed Senate the Secretary of the Interior was to administer the reclamation act.

POWERS OF BOARD.

As it passed the House a board to establish veterans' settlement projects. The board may contract with irrigation districts, drainage, or other corporations under State law to establish, develop, and improve a project.

As it passed the Senate the bill provided that through the Secretary of the Interior the Government should deal with reclamation districts under the State laws. Both Houses agreed to matter thereupon.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator means each and both Houses acted upon the same matter, and slightly disagreed?

Mr. ASHURST. I will state just where there was no agreement between the two Houses, but thus far I have not reached a matter where there has been any substantial disagreement, and in many of the cases I have mentioned they agreed in precisely.

Mr. SIMMONS. The disagreement was slight.

Mr. ASHURST. In some cases there was no disagreement.

POWERS OF BOARD.

As it passed the House there were certain powers conferred upon the board, to wit:

The board may act through any existing agency of the Federal Government in the performance of work for any project.

There was no provision in the Senate bill on that subject.

LANDS FOR SOLDIERS.

The House provision was:

All land within a project subject to sale to be allotted to veterans and repatriates.

The Senate provision was:

Veterans have preference rights to homesteads under the public land laws, and preference rights to purchase excess lands.

Each House agreed to matter granting to veterans the preference right to acquire land.

Both Houses agreed upon that matter.

The next subject on which there was an agreement was—

PRICE OF LAND TO SOLDIERS.

The House provision was:

Cost of constructing project, including purchase price of lands acquired, exclusive of administrative general office, general supervision, apportioned among units, including public lands in proportion to selling value thereof.

The Senate provision was:

Total cost of construction, operation, maintenance project, including overhead, covered by bond issue. Price and terms of sale of excess lands fixed by contract.

GOVERNMENT'S SECURITY.

The House provision was:

Each allottee of a unit shall pay the price thereof as fixed by the board, less the amount of his adjusted compensation.

The Senate provision on that matter was:

All land within district subject to payment of district bonds.

DEALING WITH THE INDIVIDUAL SOLDIER.

Under the veterans' settlement project each allottee stands in personal relation with the Government.

In the bill as it passed the Senate the provision was:

As each contract is with a reclamation district, there is no personal relation between the soldier and the Government or any other land purchaser.

ACCOUNTING.

Matter upon which both Houses agreed. The House provision was:

Soldier dealing directly with the Government and privileged to amortize his land payments over 25 years.

The Senate provision was:

Money to pay bonds raised at small expense through existing taxing channels.

NOTICE AS TO AVAILABILITY AND THE OPENING OF THE PROJECTS.

Matter upon which both of the Houses agreed. The House provision was:

Description of projects, statement construction charges and other conditions to be mailed to any veteran whose name has been certified to the board.

The Senate provision was:

The Secretary of the Interior to give the notices.

SOLDIERS WHO MAY ACQUIRE LAND.

Matter upon which both Houses agreed. Under the House bill the provision was:

Veterans of the World War and repatriates.

The Senate provision was:

Veterans of the military or naval forces of the United States in war with Germany, Spain, or Philippine Islands.

Mr. President, I could rest this point upon that alone. Both Houses agreed to matter—and note the emphasis I place upon the word "matter," because that is the word in the rule. Both Houses agreed to matter granting veterans the right to lands.

RESIDENCE.

More matter upon which both Houses agreed.

Under the House bill the provision was: The board shall make regulations as to residence upon and use or cultivation of units.

The Senate provision was the same as provided by the homestead law.

SOLDIERS RESTRICTED IN SALE OR ENCUMBRANCE OF LAND.

Additional matter upon which both Houses agreed.

Under the House bill the provision was: Prior to deed no transfer, assignment, mortgage, or lease of interest of purchaser valid unless approved by board.

The Senate provided that this should be governed by the homestead law.

EMPLOYMENT OF SOLDIERS.

More matter upon which both Houses agreed.

Under the House bill the provision was: Veterans, where practical, be employed on projects.

The Senate provision was the same.

EMPLOYMENT OF SOLDIERS.

More matter upon which both Houses agreed. The House provision was:

Veterans where practical shall be employed on projects.

The same language is in the bill as it passed the Senate. Both Houses agreed on this, and under the salutary Curtis rule the conferees may not eliminate matter agreed to by both Houses.

FARM UNITS.

More matter agreed to by both Houses. Under the provision the provision was:

The board establishes farm units of acreage sufficient for cultivation by and the support of a family.

SENATE PROVISION.

Area of land sufficient in size to support a family, area not to exceed 160 acres.

DISPOSAL OF EXCESS LANDS.

The House provision was:

All privately owned land within a project in excess of farm unit must be conveyed to Government.

In regard to excess lands, the action taken by the Senate was:

Eighty per cent of all privately owned land within a project in excess of farm unit must be disposed of by Secretary of the Interior to settlers at prices and terms fixed in advance.

LAND FOR PUBLIC PURPOSES.

Now I reach some matter upon which both Houses did not agreee.

The House inserted the following upon this topic:

Board may set aside land within projects for public purposes.

There was no provision by the Senate.

TOWN SITES.

The House provision was:

Board may establish town sites, develop and sell town lots to soldiers.

There was no provision by the Senate in that regard.

ACQUIRING LAND.

More matter upon which both Houses agreed. The House provided:

Board may by gift, purchase, deed in trust, or otherwise, acquire lands for projects.

The Senate provision on that subject was:

The United States may acquire land for construction but not for agricultural purposes. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to accept by gift, deed in trust, or otherwise, this land.

LIMITATION ON FEDERAL APPROPRIATION.

No limitation by the House. Senate created a revolving fund of $350,000,000, to be repaid. Both Houses did not agree upon that, so I would not ground the point of order upon that particular subject.

And finally, as to interest, both Houses agreed even as to what the rate of interest should be. The House provision was:

All deferred payments on land under amortization plan to bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum.

The Senate provision was:

District bonds to bear interest at a rate not exceeding 5 per cent per annum.

Mr. President, I really need not have tired you by reading this long list of paragraphs containing matter wherein the Senate and the House agreed. I could have read only the last paragraph providing for the interest to make out my case, but I deemed it my duty to give to the Presiding Officer the analysis which had been prepared for me upon this subject.

I respectfully submit in support of the point of order the following: We frequently see legislation go to conference. When it returns the report of the conferees may not satisfy all of us. The House Members desire their amendments retained and the Senators desire their amendments retained.

I invoke that which is a salutary, indeed, necessary, rule for legislation. I invoke that wise rule introduced by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], which leaves to the people's representatives the right to make law. We have already observed conferees inserting matter not agreed to by either House and rejecting matter agreed to by both Houses. Both Houses agreed to a land-settlement plan for ex-service men. Both Houses in many instances agreed to language and to matter as to what the details should be.

I thank the Chair for his patience.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD, in parallel columns, as requested.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not know that the Chair needs any extraneous argument to decide the point of order, but the Chair has so patiently listened to the argument of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] that it seems to me I may well take a moment or two in reply thereto.

I first want to correct the statement of the Senator from Arizona in which he alluded to the tariff bill and in which he assumed that there was not left in the tariff bill, as it came from the House, the embargo. As a matter of fact, what is called the embargo or the licensing system upon dyes is a part of the tariff laws of the United States, and the House was careful, while it repealed other sections of the emergency tariff act, to preserve that section relating to dyes and chemicals. So that law was specially preserved. The Senate repealed the whole matter relating to dyes and embargoes, in other words, repealed the law of June 27, 1921, and inserted in lieu thereof the so-called Bursum amendment. Therefore, everything that was between the embargo and the Bursum amendment was in controversy. It was sent back by the House not on a point of order but because the House desired to change its mind and instruct its conferees to do what it had voted prior thereto was not to be done—namely, to now dispose of the embargo.

Every question of order must be decided upon the particular facts in the case and as those facts are somewhat lengthy I shall not attempt to present them except to say that the House actually provided for a land-settlement scheme as one of the things of which the soldier might avail himself. That was to be done through Government expense, and in every respect the soldier was connected up directly with it. The Senate reported in favor of striking out that land-settlement plan entirely, which was germane and which was proper. The Senate then inserted not a land-settlement scheme but a reclamation project and did not connect the soldier up with it in any way. It did not provide that a single dollar which would otherwise go to the soldier could go to him if he adopted the reclamation scheme which was presented by the Senate. The only reference to the soldier in the reclamation scheme adopted by the Senate was a reassertion of the law which now exists, namely, that the soldier should have a preference right upon any public lands or upon any scheme of irrigation that might be established in the future. One of them was a project to be conducted by the Government. The other was a reclamation scheme in no way connected with the soldier whatever, and it was a scheme which was so entirely different from that of the House that no one claimed that the two could be combined or that we could work out any kind of a scheme embodying any part of the two unless we wrote in new matter that was not passed upon by either House.

So we have this presentation of the case. The House presented a land settlement scheme for the benefit of the soldier. The Senate introduced an independent reclamation scheme connected up with certain districts, bonds to be issued at some future time when the land should double in value, and it made no provision whatever that a dollar of the compensatory dollars which go to the soldier could be used in the reclamation project. It simply gave the soldier the preference right, and which right would be the same right as any other individual would have except it would be preferential. But that to me makes but little if any difference in the aspect of the question as it is presented to the Chair.

The conferees had a right to stand by the Senate action in striking out the House provision. The House conferees had a right to recede. No one doubts that. On the other hand the House had a perfect right to disagree with the Senate amendment and, having the right to disagree, the conferees of the Senate had a right to insist upon their disagreement. That is exactly what they did. In other words, the Senate had a right to insist upon its amendment striking out the provision of the House bill. The conferees had the right to disagree to the Senate amendment and come to an agreement.

Now, let me make this perfectly clear. I repeat that the Chair is not to decide that there is something in conference between the two Houses on a certain subject on which they agreed because there is a sentence in one bill and a like sentence in another bill, or in one amendment and in another amendment. We must take the amendment and ask, Could they have built up anything out of the House provision and the Senate amendment without violating every rule of conference by inserting strictly new matter and in fact writing a bill to which neither House had ever agreed? And that is what would have been the case.

Let us suppose now that there is an agreement upon every provision except that which is covered by Title VIII, and the House writes in Title VIII a provision to allow each soldier to select in lieu of any of the other four options 100 barrels of apples. The Senate strikes that out, and, following a wise course, says, "We are likely to have a cold winter and no coal and so we will provide that each soldier may, if he sees fit, exhaust his money in the purchase of 50 cords of wood." The apples and the cords of wood can not be mixed and a new proposition be brought in containing both of them. Very well. The conferees may agree to retain the provision as to 50 cords of wood or to the other provision as to 100 barrels of apples; but the two are totally unrelated.

The Senate would have a right to insist that it would not accept the provision with regard to the 100 barrels of apples, and the House would have an equal right to insist that it would not agree to the provision giving an option of 50 cords of wood. I do not think the conferees are compelled, because something additional has been added, to agree to something between the two or to agree to a combination of the two.

Mr. President, there are good parliamentarians in the other House. The Speaker of the House, I think, is recognized as peculiarly qualified in the matter of discussing all parliamentary questions. Exactly the same question was presented in the House on yesterday. It was argued on both sides. I merely desire to quote a brief statement by Representative ANDERSON, of Minnesota, and then the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from North Dakota that the Chair has very carefully read the entire debate which occurred in the House of Representatives upon the subject, and also the ruling of the Speaker of the House.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, Mr. President, I certainly do not desire to take up any time in reading it to the Chair. I merely desired to substantiate what I have said here, that the holding of the Chair in the body at the other end of the Capitol was that each House could disagree with the proposition of the other on these practically unrelated subjects, and were not compelled to bring in a new provision. In fact, the Chair also held that they could not have combined the two provisions in any way without violating the clear rule against the bringing in of new matter by the conferees.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I signified my intention before the Senate proceeded to consider the pending conference report of making a point of order against the report for the reasons that have been assigned by the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], who has made the point of order. I wish to say briefly—for I am not going to take up the time of the Senate—that I have voted at least a dozen times for proposed adjusted-compensation legislation in one form or another. I am as heartily in favor of an adjusted compensation bill as is any Senator here. I think we have procrastinated and have delayed the matter too long, and I am sorry that it is now in the condition in which it is. I am sincerely of the opinion that it would hasten and help in having the bill enacted into law if there were carried in it the provision touching reclamation. I have no doubt personally that the conferees have exceeded their authority in striking out both the House and the Senate provisions on that subject.

I can not see any force in the argument of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] when he talks about a cord of wood and a barrel of apples. The two propositions are not analogous. The fact confronts us that the House adopted a provision touching land reclamation, land settlement, and land irrigation, giving a preference to soldiers of the late war; the Senate also adopted a plan touching reclamation, irrigation, and land settlement, giving preference to soldiers of the late war. The details of the two plans were quite different, it is true, but both sought a common end.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield to me at that point?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. It is true, as the Senator has stated, that in some places the details of the two plans were different; but I ask the Senator to remember, as I know he does remember, that in many instances the language was identical.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. And that even the rates of interest fixed were identical.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. And in many places which I have read the language was identical.

Mr. HARRISON. And both had the same object; both sought to benefit the same individuals, namely, the soldiers of the late war, through some plan of irrigation, reclamation, and land settlement. Simply because there were some details in the so-called McNary bill which were different from the provisions of the House bill, it seems to me it would be going quite too far to say that the conferees were not to adjust their differences and include in their report a provision dealing with the subject matter with which they had been instructed by both the House and the Senate to deal, instead of eliminating the whole subject from the conference report.

When the House adopted their provision they believed that there would be obtained for the soldiers some preference in the matter of land settlement, reclamation, and irrigation; when the Senate adopted their provision they believed that the soldiers of the war would receive some preference touching reclamation, irrigation, and land settlement; but the conferees take a different position. They say, "Notwithstanding the action of both branches of the Congress, we will wipe out the entire provision; there will be no legislation touching reclamation; there will be no preference to the soldier with respect to irrigation projects." So I submit they have exceeded their authority; they have violated that portion of Rule XXVII which, merely to refresh the recollection of the Chair, I am going to read:

> Conferees shall not insert in their report matter not committed to them by either House, nor shall they strike from the bill matter agreed to by both Houses.

I submit that when the House and the Senate have dealt with a subject matter having a common purpose, to give preference to the soldiers, even though the details are different, the conferees have no right to eliminate the proposition from the conference report.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be glad to hear the Senator from North Carolina, but after that there will be no further debate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not know that I desire to discuss the point of order, but I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry before I proceed to speak at all. Will it be in order in the Senate, as it is in the House, to move to recommit the conference report with instructions to the conferees?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that such a motion as that suggested by the Senator from North Carolina will not be in order; that the conference report being before the Senate for consideration the only question will be on agreeing to the report.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, no motion to recommit with instructions will be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of that view.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, that being so, a question of order has been raised as to the action of the conferees with reference to the land-settlement provision for the benefit of the soldiers. The Senate struck out the House provision relating to that subject. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] offered a substitute provision looking to the same general end, which, after much discussion and due deliberation, the Senate adopted. I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon whether he desires to insist upon all of his rights with reference to the action of the conferees or whether he is ready to abandon his amendment?

Mr. MCNARY. I think the inquiry is quite pertinent. I may say to the Senator from North Carolina that I am sorely disappointed at the action of the conferees, and had entertained the thought that perhaps they had exceeded their jurisdiction, but I think it would be fruitless longer to contend for favorable action by the Congress on the land-settlement provision. I do not want to be placed in the position of holding up the soldiers' adjusted compensation on account of a reclamation measure which I think the Congress will pass as an independent bill and which has its status as such fixed on the calendar.

The House yesterday gave no hope that they would insist upon a land-settlement provision, and, as the measure has come to the Senate to-day, I do not entertain the hope that favorable action in the Senate in reference to the land-settlement provision will change the attitude of the House. The result of any such effort, I fear, would be to postpone the enactment of a bill into law which I think will receive a majority of the votes of this body. For that reason I am quite content, though rather unhappy about it, to let the matter go in its present form. That is the reason why I did not make the point of order or ask the Senate to insist upon the conferees holding fast to the reclamation amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I asked the question because I apprehended the Chair would probably overrule the point of order, and in that event I wanted to know whether we had any rights in this matter which could be asserted with a reasonable prospect of success. I asked the question whether in case the point of order is overruled it would be permissible to move to recommit with instructions. The Chair advises me that he is inclined to the opinion that such a motion would not be in order.

If I were assured that the Senator who introduced this amendment and the Senators on the other side of the Chamber who voted for it would stand with us on this side of the Chamber in support of a motion to overrule the Chair if he should decide that we do not have a right to move to recommit with instructions, I would be willing to go on with this fight to the end, because that is the only way in which we can get results. I can not understand why it is proper in the legislative procedure of one branch of the Congress to move to recommit with instructions, while it is not permissible in the Senate branch of the Congress, where we have fewer rules and where we act upon reason and upon precedent to make the same motion; but if the Chair so rules there is no hope unless we can marshal the necessary number of votes to overrule that decision. That will depend absolutely upon the attitude of the original proponent of this amendment. The original proponent of this amendment is the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], an earnest advocate of the bonus, an earnest friend of the soldier, and a member of the farm bloc of the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I probably am out of order in discussing this question of order; but I propounded a parliamentary inquiry, and the Chair did me the courtesy of expressing a tentative opinion about the matter, and it is the tentative opinion of the Chair that I am discussing, and not the point of order.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the point of order I make—that the Senator's remarks are not even directed toward the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that as debate upon a point of order is only at the pleasure of the Chair, and, for information with respect to the point of order, a discussion of any other subject is not in order.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask permission to say that I was only discussing this matter with a view of ascertaining whether or not it is worth while to carry on this fight. I was saying that it is of no use to carry it on if we are going to be abandoned in the fight by the proponents of the bill on the other side of the Chamber, and I wished to ascertain whether they are going to abandon us or stand with us. I am willing to fight to the end for giving the soldiers this great benefit—a benefit which I stated in a speech which I made here, in my judgment, amounts to more and will amount to more to the soldier than the cash bonus will amount to. I would rather have it, as an individual, than to have the cash bonus, and therefore I am ready to fight for it if the friends of this proposition will stand up and contend for its inclusion in the bill; but if they are going to abandon it I should like to know it, so that I may determine what course I shall pursue. That is my reason for discussing it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] presents the following point of order, namely, that the conferees had no jurisdiction or authority to agree to the elimination of both the House provision and the Senate provision with respect to the subject that has been discussed.

The point is founded upon the first sentence of paragraph 2 of Rule XXVII, which is as follows:

> Conferees shall not insert in their report matter not committed to them by either House, nor shall they strike from the bill matter agreed to by both Houses.

The Chair recognizes that there may be difference of opinion upon the question presented by the point of order. The Chair has very carefully read and considered the respective provisions upon this general subject in the House bill and in the Senate bill, and is entirely familiar with every part of the provisions made by the House and the amendment adopted by the Senate. The Chair has also examined, with all the care that was possible in the time at his command, the precedents that bear upon the matter. He has found no precedent that can be considered as at all pertinent to the question raised by the Senator from Arizona.

The question involves an application of the rule concerning which there can be no doubt whatever to a particular state of facts. We all agree that the conferees can not eliminate from the bill matter which has been agreed upon by both Houses. No one disputes that proposition. It is not only contained in the rule to which the Chair has referred, but it is the general parliamentary law. It is the precise rule invoked by the Speaker of the House in passing upon a similar point of order against the conference report on this bill.

It would serve no useful purpose for the Chair to analyze these two propositions. It is only necessary for the Chair to state his conclusions.

In the opinion of the Chair nothing has been agreed upon by the two Houses so far as this question is concerned. The plan proposed by the House and the plan proposed by the Senate are so essentially, fundamentally different, that it can not be said that the fact that there may be here and there a phrase or a sentence common to the two bills enables one to reach the conclusion that there has been any agreement whatever. In the judgment of the Chair there has been no agreement of any kind on the part of the two Houses respecting this subject. The conclusion to which the Chair has come is fortified by the ruling of the Speaker of the House of Representatives upon exactly the same question, and governed by precisely the same parliamentary law—in the case of the House, general parliamentary law; in the case of the Senate, it is a definite expression of the law found in the rules.

The Chair overrules the point of order, and the question is upon agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate disagree to the conference report, and ask for a further conference with the House to insist upon the McNary amendment to the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I raise the point of order that the motion is not in order, there being no conference committee, the conferees appointed by the House having ceased to function when the House acted upon the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The opinion of the Chair is perfectly well settled upon that question, and the only way in which the ruling can be changed is by an appeal.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I merely want to state to the Chair that the motion I have made is the only motion now before the Senate, and I have a right to a vote on my motion. No other motion has been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is upon agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. HARRISON. That motion has not been made, may I say, with due deference to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It automatically becomes the question before the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. The order was that we proceed to the consideration of the conference report. No motion has been made to agree to the conference report. On the contrary, I have made a motion, and it is the only motion pending before the Senate. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair, and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McCUMBER. In the meantime, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	du Pont	McCumber	Shields
Ball	Ernst	McLean	Shortridge
Borah	Fletcher	McNary	Simmons
Brandegee	Glass	Nelson	Smoot
Broussard	Gooding	New	Stanfield
Bursum	Hale	Nicholson	Sterling
Cameron	Harreld	Norbeck	Swanson
Capper	Harrison	Oddie	Trammell
Colt	Heflin	Phipps	Underwood
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Ransdell	Walsh, Mass.
Cummins	Kellogg	Rawson	Watson, Ga.
Curtis	King	Reed, Pa.	Williams
Dillingham	Lenroot	Sheppard	Willis

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is upon the appeal from the ruling of the Chair on the motion made by the Senator from Mississippi, which the Secretary will state.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. That the conference report be recommitted to the committee of conference with instructions to include what is known as the McNary amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to know if it is in order to discuss the appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that it is a debatable question.

Mr. SIMMONS. There are two things involved in this appeal from the ruling of the Chair. The first is whether this body is to be bound by this ruling not only to-day but, as a precedent, in the future, and that, to my mind, raises a very important question, a question which goes to the very powers and rights of the Senate with reference to conference reports.

The second question raised is whether the friends of this amendment of the Senator from Oregon are going meekly to submit to its slaughter by a few Senators and Representatives on the conference committee, and by its premature abandonment by the Senate conferees.

I would be very glad if we could have order in the Chamber, Mr. President. I am discussing a very important matter. I am talking about a matter of grave importance to the dignity and the power of the Senate, to express its disapproval of conference action. A larger number of Senators ought to be here to participate in the discussion of a matter of such dignity and importance.

It is now proposed to establish, as a permanent rule governing the action of this body, the proposition that when the Senate has acted and the House has acted, and the conferees have acted in review of the separate action of the Houses, and the conference report is presented to the Senate, a report comprising their determination with reference to what shall stay in the bill as placed there by the Senate, and what shall go out of the bill, a Senator has no right to vote upon that question except to cast an affirmative or negative vote upon the question of whether he agrees to the conference report or not; that the Senate must accept the whole report or reject the whole report; that it has no right to return the matter to the conferees for any purpose whatsoever, either to carry out an instruction or to correct an error.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator how the report could be returned to the conferees when there is no conference committee longer in existence?

Mr. SIMMONS. We could appoint new conferees. That is very simple——

Mr. LENROOT. That is a different proposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know what the House did yesterday. I assume it appointed new conferees.

Mr. LENROOT. No; it agreed to the report, and the conferees were automatically discharged.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am speaking of the action of the House on the day before yesterday, when the House recommitted the tariff bill with instructions.

Mr. LENROOT. The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. The matter before the Senate now is the conference report on the bonus bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I referred to the tariff bill. I was asking the Senator what the House did with reference to the conference report on the tariff bill. Did it not recommit it with instructions?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but the conferees had not been discharged in that case, so that the conference committee was in existence. But when either House agrees to a conference report, that automatically discharges the conferees, and there is no longer any conference committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. That should not deprive us of the right to have this matter referred back for further action. I have not considered that question, but if it becomes necessary to appoint new conferees and ask the House for further conference, we can do that. What I am insisting upon is that we shall not, by the ruling of the Chair, as we would if we submit to that ruling, lose all rights to have the conference report corrected, or to have the conference committee carry out the will of the Senate, and that we shall not be limited to the small privilege of taking the whole or taking none.

Mr. LENROOT. No rights can be lost, because the Senate will have the opportunity, if it sees fit, to reject the conference report. If the conference report is rejected, another conference can then be asked.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all there is to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. That might possibly be true; but why do by indirection what we ought to have the right to do directly? Why vote upon the question of adopting this as a whole, or rejecting it as a whole, when we ought to have the right to send it back and have it corrected before we are put to the test of voting for it or against it?

The House has a rule in these matters, and that rule is that a motion to recommit with instructions is in order. The President of the Senate has ruled that such a motion in this body is not in order. Upon what authority the Chair bases that ruling I do not know, and I do not know why one rule prevails in one legislative body of the Congress and not in the other, especially why it should obtain in a body where they have very strict parliamentary rules, and should not obtain in a body where we try to act upon the reason of things, and not have our hands tied by technical, fixed, rigid, and unyielding rules.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator says he knows of no precedent. If he desires one, I have one by Vice President Marshall, of his own party, directly in point.

Mr. SIMMONS. I say to the Senator that even if that be true it makes no difference. If the Vice President ever made such a ruling, we should reverse it. I want to appeal to Senators in this Chamber for that liberty of action on the part of Senators, in harmony with the great traditions of this body, which would enable them to get at the vitals of a matter and enable them to express their will, if they desire so to express it, upon legislation, up to the time when that legislation becomes effective by passing out of the hands of the Congress.

I am enamored of the liberal rules of the Senate. They permit us generally to do things. They do not tie our hands. But here it is proposed to establish a precedent, or to continue a precedent, if you prefer so to state it, which ties our hands and does not permit us to make a motion which any parliamentary body in the world except the United States Senate would entertain and act upon.

I want to see overruled these precedents, which, in my judgment, are based upon no good foundation, upon no consideration of good public policy, upon no consideration which takes into consideration the rights and the dignity of this highest legislative body in the world, but upon some quibbling and some technicality. I want to see such a precedent, if it exists, overridden, and we have now an opportunity to override it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 270) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to establish a credit with the United States for the Government of Liberia.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I know that we could vote down the proposition to concur and then the matter would have to go back to conference. I know that, but why should I be required to cast that vote upon the proposition instead of first having a vote upon the question of sending it back in order that an error, a wrong, or an injustice, or a disregard of the expressed will of the Senate, upon which the Senate desires to insist, should be corrected, with instructions to our conferees not to go there and, after a little perfunctory consideration of the objections of the House, meekly submit and surrender to the action of the House with reference to a vital matter? I know how these things very frequently are done in conference. I know that if the Senate conferees understood that if they ruthlessly trampled upon the will of the Senate and yielded the action of the Senate without a proper effort to maintain and sustain it that the matter could be sent back and would be sent back to them with instructions as is done in the House, Senate conferees would not so perfunctorily consider and readily yield up the will of the Senate.

I know the effects of that rule upon the Members of the House. Every Member of the House knows the effect of the rule. The House conferees go into conference with the full knowledge that their insistence upon House action must be satisfactory to the House, that if they yield in an important matter when, in the judgment of the House, they ought not to have yielded, and when the House further desires to express or to emphasize its protest, that it will have an opportunity to do it. I know that has exercised a tremendously restraining influence upon the House conferees in yielding upon House action, and so has enabled them repeatedly to overcome the Senate in a contest over a vital matter in a bill. Everybody knows that. If the House shall have a rule of the sort, with a determination to enforce it as it has shown in recent years, and we are denied it, I say to the Senate to-day that the conferees from this body go into every conference at a disadvantage with the conferees on the part of the House, and I want to remove that disadvantage.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it not true that the House has exactly the same practice, that a motion to recommit a conference report in the House is not in order where the Senate has acted first upon the report?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not try to charge my mind with a detailed knowledge of the House rules. They are so complex and numerous that one who has not spent a considerable length of time in service in that body would hardly be familiar with them, but I know that the House has the right to recommit. How far that extends I do not undertake to explain in detail.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi, who, having served many years in the House before he came to this body, is more familiar than I myself am with the House rules and practices.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not understand the Senator from Wisconsin to say that a motion to recommit a bill to conference is ever privileged in the House.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, certainly. The Senator has used that, as I have done, many times. Where the Senate has acted first and the conferees have been discharged, there can be no recommital in such a case. But if the House acts first, then the Senate may recommit any conference report where it gets the papers in the case.

Mr. HARRISON. But where a motion to recommit might be precluded, they can always instruct the conferees.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly; after they get the bill. There is a way of doing it.

Mr. SIMMONS. May I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi, who has made a motion, that he move for the appointment of new conferees.

Mr. HARRISON. The motion I made, and the one as to which the point of order was sustained, was that the Senate disagree to the conference report, insist upon a further conference, and that the Senate conferees be instructed to insist upon the McNary amendment. That was the motion I made and that was the question presented here.

Mr. LENROOT. That is not exactly what the Senator from North Carolina has been arguing at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the substance of what I have been arguing. I have not been stating the motion. It does not make any difference about that. I want to get it through in the right way. Whose method is adopted I do not care, but I think the Senator from Mississippi has suggested the right way. It meets all the objections which have been made by the Senator from Wisconsin in his interruptions during my remarks, and which were to the effect that the conferees have been discharged, and therefore we are helpless in the matter. I have stated heretofore that if that position be correct and we were helpless because the conferees have been discharged, we could appoint new conferees. That is exactly what the motion of the Senator from Mississippi provides for. I had not quite understood it. The motion of the Senator from Mississippi provides that we reject the report and ask for a further conference with the House, which would involve the appointment of new conferees on the part of the Senate, and the House would, of course, be asked to appoint new conferees.

Mr. LENROOT. Will not the Senator agree that a motion to instruct conferees is never in order until the conferees are appointed?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know why it should not be. If I have been properly informed the House very frequently, upon a motion to appoint conferees, instructs them about certain specific things.

Now, I want to ask the Senator from Mississippi if this is correct. Of course, I expected that we would be met on this matter with all sorts of technical obstructions. The point has been made by the Senator from Wisconsin that it is not competent to instruct conferees until after the conferees have been appointed. I have stated, and I think I am correct about it, that the House frequently at the time of the appointment of conferees has exercised the right of instructing them as to certain specific matters with which they were to deal in conference. That is my impression.

Mr. HARRISON. There is no question about that. I think the Senator from Wisconsin knows of instance after instance where the Senate at the time insisted upon certain things, and they have come back two or three times.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, yes; it can be done, but not by the Senator's motion. I have before me, if the Senator will allow me, a case which came up in 1914 upon a point made by the Senator's colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] that conferees could not be instructed until after they were appointed, and Vice President Marshall sustained the point of order.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have heretofore discussed that. The Senator from Wisconsin made that point once before. He said the former Vice President, who was a Democrat, had so ruled, and the President pro tempore of the Senate had so ruled to-day. I said that I was now appealing to the Senate to overrule the President pro tempore of the Senate, and I have no hesitation in saying that the fact that the former Vice President ruled the same way does not mean that he may not have ruled incorrectly, and that he, like the President pro tempore, ought to be overruled. The Senate ought to be freed from the fetters of such a ruling and allowed to exercise what I regard as one of its inherent and fundamental rights, the right of seeing that its agents intrusted, as these conferees are, with such broad and sweeping powers, exercise those powers properly and do not sacrifice unnecessarily the position of the Senate with reference to an essential matter.

Mr. President, we do not always come to time when questions of this sort should be put to the test. I suppose that when Vice President Marshall rendered that decision it may have been about an immaterial question or it may have been about a matter of some importance, but that no particular notice was taken of it at the time, or that it did not involve a matter of great consequence. But now the ruling has been made again, and it now involves, in my judgment, a matter of very great consequence to the country, whether 4,000,000 men, who jeopardized their health and their lives, who forsook their occupations and gave their time to the Government, shall be properly compensated by the Government, whether they shall enjoy this magnificent offering contained in the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] or whether they shall be denied it. I know of no better time to bring the matter to the test, and I know of no question that would come before the Senate which more deserves discussion and consideration than this question.

I think our experiences with conferences show that the conferees ought to understand that when they put an obnoxious thing in a bill the Senate is not to be compelled to swallow it, or to defeat the other matters of great importance in the bill, as in many instances has been done. We ought to have some opportunity, before we are forced to cast that vote, to determine whether we shall agree to obnoxious and repugnant and wrongful things in order to get the virtuous things which are contained in the legislation, or whether we shall have an opportunity before we cast that vote of approval or dissent to say to our conferees, "You have not properly functioned, you have not given proper consideration to the action and the will of the Senate, and you must take it back and further insist," or, if it may be, "refuse to yield."

I say, Mr. President, that so long as the House conferees are under the coercion and threat of a rule that retains power in the body which appointed them to supervise and direct their action and to check it up, while the Senate has no such power, they go into conference with a great advantage over the Senate conferees. By reason thereof the House action receives just that much more consideration from the conference committee than does the Senate action.

Looking at this matter from any point, Mr. President, if one will properly analyze it, it assumes important proportions, and ought not to be dismissed upon the statement that a previous occupant of the chair has decided just as the present occupant of the chair has decided, and that, therefore, it has become a precedent with which we dare not interfere and which for all time must be recognized, denying us freedom of action and tying our hands in reference to the very important matter of controlling our conferees and compelling from them reasonable insistence upon our action, of whatever character it may be.

Mr. President, I have said more upon this phase of the question than I had intended to say, but there is another aspect of the matter, and that is the question of whether we are going to yield in reference to this amendment. I know, as every Senator here knows, that on many of these questions of appeal from the decision of the Presiding Officer the vote does not at all reflect the judgment of the Senate upon the question of issue—that is, whether the ruling of the Chair be right or wrong—but that the vote is largely governed by the attitude of the Senate with reference to the legislation which may be involved. That is wrong, but that has been the unbroken practice in the Senate. There is not a Senator here who will deny it. Everybody knows that Senators on the other side of the Chamber persistently do it. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] showed great zeal in favor of this amendment; he lauded its character and referred to is beneficent results to thousands and tens of thousands and even to hundreds of thousands of the citizens of the far West living in arid States; he pictured this proposed legislation as a recognition of the services of those brave boys who fought and won the battles of the country. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon, because two Senate conferees, who were the only two present, saw fit to desert his proposition, to repudiate and ignore the action of the Senate, to forget the interests of the soldier, to trample his amendment underfoot, and because the Chair, with no better reason for his ruling than that some former occupant of the chair at some time in the past had made such a ruling, and with no Senator here able to give a good, sound, and substantial reason, why the hands of the Senate should be thus tied while the hands of the other House in this particular are free and loose, if he is ready, because of those little impediments in the way, to sustain this ruling? The ruling, in my opinion, is based upon no good and sound principle of public policy or of reason; indeed, it is contrary to the most vital principles of public policy and to the rights of this great legislative body. Under such circumstances, is the Senator from Oregon ready to surrender instead of standing up here like a man who is in earnest about what he is doing, who wants to see his efforts clothed with success, who has at heart the beneficiaries of this proposed legislation and is willing to stand by them to the last ditch?

I ask the Senator from Oregon why he should not be willing to stand up here with us in our fight to overrule the Chair and to send this matter back to conference, in order that it may be further considered, in the hope of more favorable action?

Mr. President, I have said, and I repeat, that the reclamation projects proposed in the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, to my mind, are not only of great importance and value to the ex-service men, but in many instances the option proposed in the amendment will be worth more to the ex-service men than the cash bonus would be if he got the cash all at one time and will be worth infinitely more to him than the bonus provided for, of which he can only get one half, and that by hawking it about the streets, and then be in danger of losing the other half by forfeiture if he can not pay the interest upon the half which he borrows.

Furthermore, it is not only of great importance to the soldier but to the country at large. The proposition has real merit in it. I have been in favor of reclamation legislation from the beginning; it has worked wonders in the arid States; it has made worthless dry desert lands blossom as the rose; it has added enormously to the national wealth. The Government has been liberal to the reclamation projects of the West, and those who come from that section are asking that it be more liberal. I am joining in that request. I have voted for irrigation projects for years and years, although at the same time the South—the section from which I come—has been refused a dollar to be used in taking the water off of the overflowed lands of that section, numbering in acres about three times as much as the acreage which it is said is available for irrigation in the West.

Our appeal has never been responded to; we have always been met with the constitutional objection that it was constitutional to do this with reference to the arid lands because the Government owned them, or a part of them, but that it was unconstitutional to do it with reference to the swamp lands of Southern States because the Government did not own an interest in them and therefore the purpose was not one which the Constitution recognized as legitimate. I have yielded to that argument; but now, Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon has brought before us a proposition which so couples the drainage of swamp lands with a public purpose and a public use as to make it constitutional, and, therefore, through this amendment action may be taken by the Congress to do for the South for the first time what it has been doing for many, many years for the arid States of the West. When, however, the reciprocal opportunity is offered of dealing with the South in the same way that Southern Representatives have dealt with the irrigation projects of the West, I think I have the right to stand here and ask Senators from the arid regions of the West to stand firm for this amendment.

I would not intimate, Mr. President, that this amendment has become obnoxious in some quarters because it confers these governmental advantages upon other sections of the country than the West, and especially to the South, from which they have been so long withheld, and that its proponents are ready to let it die and, if need be, to join in the slaughter. I would not suggest that, or intimate it, for it would be so unworthy, Mr. President, that it would be unbecoming of me as a Senator to intimate that such was the case; but the people of my section of the country will feel, if those who want irrigation money for the West desert us when this opportunity is offered to share it with us, that there must be sectionalism in it.

I do not know how the Senators who voted to put this amendment in the bill are going to stand upon this motion to overrule the Chair, to send this amendment back with the hope that it will receive more than a perfunctory consideration by the conferees, to send it back to the conferees with the statement on the part of the Senate that it is in earnest about this matter and proposes to insist upon it. I do not know whether they are going to vote that way or not. I feel this way, though: If they are as deeply interested in the cause of irrigation as I am in the cause of reclamation, and if they are as deeply interested in giving the soldiers the benefit of this piece of legislation as I am, I feel that they will vote with us to overrule the ruling of the Chair. I shall not be satisfied by their saying that "I have considered the matter very thoroughly, and I have concluded that the Chair was right," because I know that the other side of the Chamber, where legislation is concerned, on these appeals from the Chair, do not, as a rule, consider the question of whether the ruling is right or wrong. They vote upon the question of whether it will promote or retard or defeat the legislation that they favor.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am very much surprised at the attitude taken by the Senator from North Carolina, attacking the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], the author of this amendment, because he is not, in the face of this conference report, continuing his fight for the amendment.

Mr. President, the Senate conferees have made recommendations to the Senate embodied in this conference report, and among those recommendations we find that they propose to strike out the McNary amendment and also the land-settlement provision of the House bill. After the Senator's speech, however, would anyone upon the floor or in the gallery ever imagine that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] signed the conference report making that recommendation?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I have it in my hand, with the Senator's own signature——

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Where the recommendation is "that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 62, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Omit the matter to be proposed"——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I do not yield now. "Omit the matter to be proposed by said amendment, and the Senate agree to the same," and a like recommendation striking out the provision for land settlement by the House, and here is the Senator's original signature to that recommendation:

F. M. SIMMONS.

Now I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there is no question about my signing the conference report; but I fought for this amendment and I fought for my amendment, and when they were turned down I said that notwithstanding my amendment had been eliminated and the amendment of the Senator from Oregon had been eliminated I was so much in favor of this bonus legislation that I would sign the report. That is all there is in it.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; and the Senator stood upon the floor here for an hour attacking the Senator from Oregon because he followed the recommendation of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator can make out of that just what he chooses. There is nothing in it, and the Senator knows it. The Senator knows that when I sign a conference report it does not mean that I approve the action of the conferees in refusing to include certain matters in it.

Mr. LENROOT. No; but the Senator had his opportunity, if he wanted the Senator from Oregon to follow him, to lead in refusing to sign the conference report making this recommendation. He did not do it. He did sign it, and he is in no position——

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and I signed it with the statement made to the conferees—and the Senator from North Dakota will bear me out—that notwithstanding they had cut out these amendments, I was so much in favor of the legislation that I felt that I did not wish to do anything that would retard it.

Mr. LENROOT. Now let us see where the Senator's position takes him upon that point, leaving the other for a moment. The Senator has argued here for half an hour, at least, in favor not of the motion made by the Senator from Mississippi, as it finally turns out, but in favor of a motion to recommit this report to the conferees, sending it back, as he says, to the conference. If that were done, where would it be sent to? It would be sent to its long, long sleep, from which there could never be a waking unless that action was reconsidered by the Senate itself; and yet the Senator, so eager for this adjusted compensation for the soldier, has argued that we ought to send the bill back to a conference that no longer exists, and the bill would have to remain in a pigeonhole for all time to come, because there would be no one to send it to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. When the House, a few days ago, sent back the conference report on the tariff bill with instructions to their conferees to agree to certain things that the Senate had put in the bill, did that put the tariff bill to sleep?

Mr. LENROOT. No; of course not.

Mr. SIMMONS. Did they not immediately agree to it?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator know whether or not the House will immediately agree to this? If it did not immediately agree to it, nobody would expect the Senate conferees to take action that would kill the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am astounded that so able a parliamentarian as the Senator from North Carolina is not familiar with the unbroken rule, never deviated from in either House, that when one House had acted upon a conference report that automatically discharges the conferees, and there is no longer any conference. In the case of the tariff bill, the House acted first. If it had been possible for the Senate to have acted first and then sent the tariff bill to the House, that motion, if it had been made in the House and entertained—which it would not have been—would have done for the tariff bill exactly what the Senator now proposes to do to this soldiers' bill, put it to sleep forever.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if this new conference is asked and conferees are appointed, does not the Senator know that the same conferees that were appointed upon the original bill would be appointed?

Mr. LENROOT. No; the Senator is talking about something else, now. The Senator will not deny that he argued upon this floor and held that the Chair was wrong, that Vice President Marshall was wrong, that everybody was wrong, and that it was in order, notwithstanding the fact that the House conferees had been discharged, to send this bill back to conference. Where would it go? Who would receive it? It would lie upon the desk until the final adjournment of Congress, and it would kill the bill for adjusted compensation, which the Senator says now he was so eager to get that he signed the conference report, although he was not in favor of the recommendation with reference to reclamation.

Mr. President, I do not know of any parliamentary principle that is more simple or more easily understood than that when conferees are appointed by both Houses, the House which first receives the conference report can recommit the bill, because both sets of conferees are in existence, and have never been discharged. That is what happened to the tariff bill. It would have been in order in the House to have moved to recommit this bill to conference, because no conferees had been discharged; but the moment either House agrees to a conference report, that ends the conference. The conferees are discharged, and there is only one way in which the bill can be gotten before a conference again, and that is to reject the report and secure a new conference and have new conferees appointed by both Houses. The Senator can not find any precedent in either House of Congress during all the history of the Republic that is in contravention of that principle; and yet he stood here, as I said, for an hour, arguing a perfectly simple, plain proposition, the only effect of which, if he could be successful, would be to put this adjusted compensation bill to its final death, where it never could get to the President of the United States.

Mr. President, upon the other proposition it is equally clear. There is an unbroken line of precedents. The Chair was right, although he referred to no precedent, that the first point of order made by the Senator from Arizona was properly overruled. The Chair said that he did not have a precedent, and I take it for granted that it was because the Chair had overlooked a comparatively recent precedent in 1919, a ruling by Vice President Marshall after the Curtis rule had been adopted. I shall read only the headline:

May leave out matter in the House bill which passed the Senate in substantially the same form.

I may say that this was a very much closer question than the one that the Chair had to decide; and there can not be the slightest question upon principle that the Chair was right in the ruling that he then made, and that the Chair was right in the ruling that he has now made, and from which the Senator from Mississippi has appealed. The precedents are unbroken. The Senator from Mississippi must recollect it in the House, for the rule prevails there, as it does in the Senate, that conferees can not be instructed until after they have been appointed.

This matter can be reached. The Senate is not helpless. The Senate, if it chooses, can reject this conference report. That is the first thing in order. If it does reject it, the Senator from Mississippi may then make his motion to insist upon the Senate amendment and ask for a conference, and when the conferees are appointed he may ask to instruct them. The procedure is very, very simple; but I rather anticipate that what our friends upon the other side of the aisle are seeking is to make a little political capital out of what is known as the McNary amendment, but they will not have the courage to vote directly to reject this conference report. Let us see how much courage they have, and by that courage we will measure how important they deem the McNary amendment. By that vote we will see whether some Senators upon the other side of the aisle were more anxious to do something for the soldiers than they were to get appropriations for their own States out of a reclamation fund.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if there is one Senator here who can muddy up the waters and make black appear white, it is the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. He has tried to confuse the issue, so that he can hold his forces in line; but I can not believe that with the intelligence that certain Republican Senators from the West possess, they can be hoodwinked or fooled as to the issue upon which they are now called upon to vote.

The Senator says that what we should do is first to vote down this report. That is what we would ordinarily have done, but there is nothing unusual about the present situation. What is it? The Senator from North Dakota just slept upon his position. He usually does not go to sleep. He has been working so hard here, though, that he just forgot that he should make a motion to agree to the conference report. He did not make that motion, and consequently the next motion that would be in order would be to disagree to the conference report and ask for a new conference with the House, and insist that the Senate conferees insist upon the McNary amendment.

I took that course. That was the only motion before the Senate. The Senator from Wisconsin, with his great knowledge of parliamentary law, with his astuteness as a parliamentarian, would have made a similar motion if he had been trying to do what I was trying to do. But he is trying to save the President of his party from vetoing the McNary reclamation amendment, and that is the whole situation.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I want to do something for the West, and I want to put it up to the President to see whether or not he will veto the reclamation amendment, which he and his whole party have promised, by utterances and by platform pledges, to incorporate into the law. Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator admit that if any part of a motion is out of order, it makes the entire motion out of order?

Mr. HARRISON. I knew the Senator would try to further present technical objections by which he might save his own hide and take care of his position, as well as the political hide of his colleagues and party.

Mr. LENROOT. I put a simple question to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. I made the correct motion. The Chair overruled my motion, holding that it was not in order, and I have appealed from the ruling.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator can not find a single precedent, in either the House or the Senate, to sustain him in his position that his motion is in order, but he can find a multitude of them that his motion is not in order.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has not shown any.

Mr. LENROOT. I have them here.

Mr. HARRISON. Those were on motions to recommit.

Mr. LENROOT. They were not on a motion to recommit.

Mr. HARRISON. It does not apply to this proposition at all. The last decision the Senator read was one handed down by Mr. Marshall, where the House and the Senate had incorporated a certain provision, but because there was some difference, and the conferees had stricken the provision out, he held it was in order.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator wants the precedent, I will give it to him.

Mr. HARRISON. Let the Senator give it.

Mr. LENROOT. I read from Gilfry's Precedents:

A motion to instruct may not be made until conferees are appointed.

This is dated January 27, 1914, and the ruling is by Vice President Marshall.

The House asked a conference on H. R. 32, "To provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania," and Mr. Norris moved to instruct the conferees.

The question arose on the other side of the aisle. I read further:

Mr. OVERMAN. I rise to a question of order. A motion to instruct the conferees is not in order until after the conferees have been appointed.

The VICE PRESIDENT (Mr. MARSHALL). It will be the ruling of the Chair that the conferees must first be appointed, if there is to be a motion made to instruct the conferees.

Mr. HARRISON. There never had been at that time any conferees appointed.

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. HARRISON. In this case there have been conferees appointed.

Mr. LENROOT. But the conference committee is not in existence any longer.

Mr. HARRISON. The House and the Senate appointed conferees, they met, and they knocked out the reclamation proposition for the West. The Senator's precedent recites that no conferees had ever been appointed. The cases are quite different. The conference report has been agreed to by the House, and that is the reason why I did not move to recommit the report to the conference, because I knew that the conferees upon the part of the House have been dismissed.

Mr. LENROOT. So there are no conferees.

Mr. HARRISON. There are no House conferees.

Mr. LENROOT. Nor Senate conferees.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senate has not yet adopted the report of the conferees. That is why I moved that the Senate disagree to the conference report, ask for a further conference with the House, and that the Senate conferees insist upon the McNary amendment. The motion I have made is the only kind of a motion that could have been made in an orderly way. If the Senate wants to sustain the Chair and hold that we have not a right to send the report back to the House, that the House may pass upon it, then, well and good; but you will never be able to hoodwink and deceive and fool the people of the West by any such technical objections as the Senator from Wisconsin has raised, because they are reasonable, intelligent people and they know how long and patiently they have waited and how very much they need this reclamation legislation.

They realize how often you have promised it to them, and you are trying to withhold it from them by the employment of shrewd parliamentary tactics; but you can not do it. They know that a motion to recommit is in order in the House. They know we are proceeding in an orderly way here; and if the friends of reclamation from the West are really for the McNary proposition and really want the House to consider it and want the conferees to agree to it, then they should vote to overrule the decision of the Chair. If they want to give countenance and encouragement to shrewd parliamentarians in the use of highly technical objections in order to kill it, then well and good. But you must make answer to them for your action.

I know I would be wrong in my contention if the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], had moved to agree to the conference report. That motion would have had preference. But he did not make the motion. It was not before the Senate, and the only motion that was before the Senate was the one I made, namely, to disagree to the conference report, ask for a new conference, and instruct the Senate conferees to insist in conference on the McNary reclamation proposition.

Do not be deceived as to the issue. We are going to take the vote now. If you vote to sustain the Chair, reclamation for the West will be gone. I take no stock in the suggestion made by the Senator from Wisconsin that a vote to overrule the Chair would kill the adjusted compensation bill. Those of us who are for reclamation are for the adjusted compensation bill. We want it to go to the President, and Senators on the other side know that the word has been passed down the line that the President intends to veto the adjusted compensation bill.

Some of you have gone around and counted noses to see whether or not you could pass it over his veto. You do not believe that you can pass it over his veto. The vote will be close. But if we put in the reclamation proposition, the thing he has promised, which you have promised, which the West is interested in, which your platform enunciates, he will think a longer time before he vetoes the adjusted compensation bill. One may carry the other through.

I am for this legislation therefore for two reasons: First, because I am for the reclamation proposition on its face, believing that it will be beneficial to the arid regions of the West. I am for it for the other reason that it will help the adjusted compensation bill to get out of the clutches of the President of the United States and become a law.

Men from the West, if you really have been honest with your constituents, if you are sincerely for this legislation, now is the best time you will ever have to give it to them, because Congress will adjourn in a few days and not meet until December. The next session will be a short session. Appropriation bills will be crowded in, and the McNary measure will be forgotten. Now is the only time to get it through. How are you going to vote, Senators from Oregon? Are you going to vote to sustain the Chair and see the McNary reclamation bill killed? How are you going to vote, Senators from Oklahoma and Colorado and Idaho and Utah and all the other Western States, whose hearts are wrapped up in this proposition? By your votes you will answer.

On my appeal I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I want to say a word on this parliamentary situation. I do not believe the ruling of the Chair is correct, provided the Senate conferees were right yesterday in going back to a conference with the House on the tariff bill notwithstanding the fact that the House had rejected the conference report. We must take one horn of the dilemma or the other.

Of course, the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin that you can not instruct conferees until the conferees are appointed is well sustained by parliamentary law. But if conferees have been appointed and not discharged, to illustrate, if conferees make a partial report, which does not discharge them, it is not necessary then to wait until the appointment of new conferees, but you can appoint the existing conferees.

Of course, in accepting the conference report the House discharged their own conferees, and whether that action discharges the Senate conferees or not is the issue before the Senate. In other words, whether the action of the House of Representatives discharged the Senate conferees is the question to be decided.

I am not inclined to think it did. I think each House must act, and holds jurisdiction over its own conferees. Of course, if the action of the House in accepting the conference report discharged our conferees, then the Senator would be right. But day before yesterday the House disagreed to the conference report on the tariff bill. Of course, it disagreed to it in an unusual way, but nevertheless it disagreed to it.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand the proposition. The Senator need not explain it to me. They instructed their conferees to change the report, which was a rejection of the report as it came to the House.

Mr. LENROOT. It was a recommittal of the report with instructions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But not by the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. By the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is just what I am coming to. Of course, if that action on the part of the House affected the Senate conferees, then the Senate conferees had no right to go back to the conference.

Mr. LENROOT. But the House conferees were not discharged under that action.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It practically discharged them, because it rejected the report. When the conferees make a final report in either House, and it is accepted, the conferees are discharged under parliamentary law.

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But it is not until the report comes to each particular body that the conferees of that body are discharged. When the House conferees made their final report to the House they were discharged, and the House appointed new conferees, but the Senate did not. The Senate did not discharge its conferees. I presume the Senate is going to say that it did not discharge its conferees, because if they do not say it, they will have to send the tariff bill back to conference by appointing new conferees to act on it, or reappointing the same conferees. There is no question about that.

I contend that the action of the House has not discharged the conferees. If that is so, then this parliamentary situation is plain. Of course, after a bill goes to conference, the undisputed principle of parliamentary law is that a motion which tends to bring the two Houses together has precedence, and undoubtedly if the Senator from North Dakota had made a motion that the Senate agree to the conference report, that would have precedence, and would have taken the place of all other motions which might have been made; but he did not make it.

The Chair has ruled that that motion was made automatically, and I do not agree with the Chair about that. In parliamentary law there are no automatic motions unless the rules provide for them. There is an automatic motion in the House of Representatives in ascertaining a quorum. When it is found by the Speaker in the House that a quorum is not present he orders a roll call, and immediately orders the Sergeant at Arms to bring in the absentees. It is an automatic motion, because the rules of the House provide for its being an automatic motion. But unless the rules provide for an automatic motion, no motion comes before a parliamentary body that is not made by a man in the Senate, by a Senator standing on his feet addressing the Chair. There was no motion made in this case to agree to the conference report. Therefore the motion to disagree, which was made by the Senator from Mississippi, was in order, and coupled with that motion to disagree it was perfectly in order to move to ask for a new conference. That is how the motion has often been made—a motion to disagree and to ask for a further conference.

Mr. LENROOT. If the motion asked for a new conference, would it not necessarily imply that the prior conferees had been discharged?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is entirely within the action of the Senate to discharge its conferees or not. The Senate conferees have not been discharged up to this time. If the Senate desires to recognize its conferees, it may do so, unless it is going to be held that, no action having been taken, the conferees on the tariff bill improperly went back and signed the new conference report. The question is one or the other. The Senate can take either horn of the dilemma; but if it is said the conferees were automatically discharged, then we say the others were discharged.

Mr. LENROOT. No; because in that case the House had not acted upon the conference report, upon either agreeing or disagreeing, but it recommitted it to the same conferees.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then the report is out of order, because if there was nothing involved except the instructions of the House and it was not upon a free conference, they have made changes which they had no right to make.

Mr. LENROOT. It was a recommittal to the same conference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But they made changes in other parts of the bill. They did not limit their changes in the last conference report to the matters of instruction of the House. They raised the rates on all the dye products in the bill, which had nothing to do with the instructions of the House.

Mr. LENROOT. But the conferees had never been discharged in that case. In the present case the House conferees had been discharged.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That does not discharge the Senate conferees. The Senate does not have to discharge the Senate conferees if it does not want to do so. By motion it may continue its conferees.

Mr. LENROOT. If it does, how will they ever get a conference without a new conference being asked by the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] asks for a further conference. That is how we get it. If we propose, instead of saying that the Chair shall appoint the conferees, that the existing conferees shall continue to be the conferees on the part of the Senate, it is a perfectly legitimate and parliamentary motion.

Mr. LENROOT. That operates as a new appointment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When we instruct the existing conferees as to what they shall do, it is a continuance of the conferees who now exist. That is all there is to it. Under those circumstances I think the Chair was wrong in overruling the point of order because the conferees exist and are subject to instructions. We have a right to continue them. There is no doubt in the world that the motion to disagree and ask for a further conference was in order as long as there was no motion pending to agree to the conference report. So I think, as a preliminary question, that the motion of the Senator from Mississippi was entirely in order.

Now, I want to say that there was just one feature of the bill which was before the Senate to which I agreed. The conferees have struck it out. The Senator from Wisconsin said that to adopt the proposition would send the bonus bill to its death. That is a good parliamentary argument in debate, but everybody knows it would not do that. Everybody knows that I am not in favor of the features of the conference report, but I know and everybody else knows that the House is not going to reject a bonus bill because there are some provisions in it relating to the irrigation of arid lands. They have already told us so. I do not know what the conferees said in conference; I do not know what occurred in the chamber of the conference committee; but I know that when the bonus bill came before the Senate from the House it carried provisions to authorize the giving of homesteads out of arid lands to the soldiers. That was the action of the House and not of the House conferees. It was the action of a majority of the House of Representatives, and no one can deny that. The Senate struck out that proposition coming from the House and, I thought properly, adopted the McNary amendment by a very substantial majority. I think the Senate amendment was much better than the House provision. So the Senate was in favor of a homestead provision.

I suppose that but a small percentage of the ex-soldiers want to homestead land or want to get a farm, but if the McNary provision, or a provision along that line giving them a preference right to take up these valuable lands, were to be included in the bill, it would be of far more value to those who wanted to accept the terms of the bill than the cash bonus or the postponed payment proposition which is proposed to be given to them now, because it would give a man an opportunity to secure a valuable home without in the end taking it out of the Treasury of the United States. The bill provided that when any of the lands went into an irrigation project those interested were limited in the amount they should receive and the balance of the land should go to settlers with the soldier having the preference.

The settler would only pay the swamp or arid value of the land with the cost of the improvements. Everybody knows that the value after the improvement was made would be and has been where proper irrigation has been applied many times in excess of the arid value plus the cost of improvement. That is what is proposed to be given to the soldiers. Then it was required that they should pay the arid value plus the cost of the improvements ultimately, and all that was done for them so far as a charge on the Government was concerned, all that was done so far as the people of the United States were concerned, was to lend the credit of the Government to those men for a few years with the resulting development to pay back the money into the Treasury.

That was not in conflict with the supposed objection of the President of the United States to the bill, that Congress was passing a bonus bill without providing the money to pay the bonus, because they were providing in the McNary amendment the terms as to when and how and where the money should be paid back. Congress was providing homes for the ex-soldiers if they were willing to accept the opportunity and work at it. I am opposed to the bonus bill so far as making a gift is concerned, but I am in favor of the McNary amendment because it is not a gift and a charge on the people of the United States, but it gives to men a real opportunity to work out their own destiny, and yet that portion of the bill which is now in it is to be rejected on a technical proposition and it is desired to close the door by sustaining the ruling of the Chair and saying that the Senate shall not insist upon this amendment. We are not going to kill the bonus bill by insisting upon the amendment. The only way the bonus bill will fail to become a law is for the President to veto it, and then there should be more than one-third of the Senators who would vote to sustain his veto. Senators know that as well as I do. If we reject the conference report and order the conferees to go back and insist on the McNary amendments and carry it back to the House of Representatives, we would get substantial legislation on the proposition.

I intend to vote to give that opportunity. I intend to vote to allow these men to have that opportunity. Of course there is no use in saying that I am going to accept the challenge of the Senator from Wisconsin by my vote because everybody knows that I am not going to vote to pay a cash bonus that is in the nature of a service pension. This is a proposition that does not weaken the bill. If I have to vote to sustain the President's veto, as I expect to do, I would rather vote for it with the McNary proposition out of the bill. It would be easier for me to vote for it to sustain his position with the McNary proposition out of the bill.

But the bill may be passed and here is a real opportunity to do good, to accomplish a real result for the men who want the opportunity. I do not think the Senate, because it wants to go home—and that is all that is involved—ought to act unwisely. Everybody knows that if the motion is adopted and the bill goes back to conference, it is only a question of a day or two of delay one way or the other. Suppose the House stands adamant, which I do not think it will, and refuses to yield. All we have to do is to come back, and yield two or three days from now. All that is involved is two or three days' time, and nothing else. It would not defeat the bill. It would not defeat anything. We could come back here two or three days from now, if they would not agree to the Senate action, and the Senate could then reverse itself. But we have never put the proposition up to the House. It has been up to the House conferees.

Of course I realize the difficulty of Senators who are in favor of a bonus bill voting against a conference report that may be adopted because some features in the bill, of which they were in favor, had been eliminated. The motion of the Senator from Mississippi does not raise that question. If it is in order, the vote would send the bill back to conference instructing the conferees to insist on the McNary amendment. Of course if the motion was just to concur, a Senator's vote might be misunderstood, but if he votes for the motion of the Senator from Mississippi and it fails, then of course the Senator from North Dakota would move to concur. If Senators are in favor of concurring, they still have the opportunty to vote to concur and show their position in reference to the bonus bill, but they would not negative that position by insisting that the conferees spend a day or two more in an effort to put back in the bill the only feature in it, so far as I am concerned, that was of value.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] have both stated that if the Senator from North Dakota had, in addition to moving to proceed to the consideration of the conference report, also moved that the Senate adopt the report of the committee of conference, then the Chair would be absolutely correct in his ruling. Now, let us analyze that contention for a moment and see if it will hold water.

Suppose the Senator from North Dakota had moved to take up a bill, the motion had prevailed, and the bill was not amended, would it have been necessary that the Senator from North Dakota should also have moved "that the bill be now passed"? Automatically, when a bill reaches that stage, the Chair puts the question, "Shall the bill now pass?" There is no question about that.

Let us take this case. The Senator from North Dakota first asked to present the report; he followed that by a motion to proceed to the consideration of the report, and that motion was carried. Under such circumstances is it necessary, then, that the Senator from North Dakota should move that the Senate adopt the report? What question is before the Senate when the Senator from North Dakota moves that the Senate consider the report and the Senate decides by its vote that it will consider it? There is just one question, Will the Senate accept or reject the report? Of course, there may be the subsidiary question, just as the Chair ruled, of the point of order being raised that the Senate conferees had exceeded their authority; but there is nothing on earth for the Senate to do except to vote up or vote down the report; to accept the report or to reject the report. It was no more necessary that the Senator from North Dakota should have coupled with his motion to proceed to the consideration of the report the motion that it should be adopted than it would be necessary if he had moved to proceed to the consideration of a bill that he also supplement his motion with a motion that the bill be passed.

Let us see what the record was? The Chair stated that the only question before the Senate was the question whether or not the conference report should be accepted. Automatically that was the only question. The record was presented in this form:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota.

That was the motion to proceed to the consideration of the report.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the conference report, which will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the conference report.

So, clearly, the conference report was laid before the Senate by the Chair, who then stated:

The question now is upon agreeing to the conference report.

The Chair followed that with this statement:

And the Chair recognizes the Senator from Mississippi, if he desires to make a point of order.

That is the situation.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. When the Chair said, "The question is upon agreeing to the conference report," it was then the duty of the Senator from North Dakota to say, "I move its adoption." When the Senator from North Dakota failed to do that the matter was open for discussion, and the Senator from Mississippi proceeded to discuss it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, suppose I failed to do so, and the Chair stated, "The question now is upon agreeing to the conference report," and that question was decided in the affirmative; does the Senator from Alabama contend that the conference report would not have been adopted?

Mr. HEFLIN. But, in the absence of the motion of the Senator from North Dakota, the Senator from Mississippi moved to disagree; and I submit that it was in order for him to do so.

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; the first thing was a point of order. The Senator from Mississippi did not move to disagree. He first discussed the point of order which had been made by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST].

Mr. HEFLIN. That is true, but he also made the motion to disagree.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it is admitted that I did not move that the Senate agree to the report, because when the report was laid before the Senate the Chair stated that the question was upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference. If there was anything wrong in that ruling of the Chair and his statement at that time, then the point of order should have been made. No point of order was made that the Chair could not submit the matter to the Senate; and the point of order, if made, undoubtedly would have been overruled in accordance with the ruling of the Chair. So it is not in the least necessary that the Senator who presents a conference report shall also move that it be adopted; for, if his motion to consider be agreed to, the only question is the adoption or rejection of the report. That was the only question in this case, just as in the case of a bill the final question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. President, in the argument on the question sustaining the Chair, much has been said as to the President's vetoing the bill, and so forth. I have felt right along and have stated over and over again that the only objections heretofore made by the President were based upon the cost and the lack of provision for a tax to meet the cost. I have also stated, and I reiterate, that it is dangerous to add to the bill a provision which for the first two or three years will make its cost from three to five times greater than the soldiers' compensation itself will call for. I may be in error; other Senators may be in error; but that is my view of the situation, that the chances in favor of the bill being signed depend upon how small the appropriation which may be required.

A tax bill, which must originate in the House, can not be put through that body. Therefore we had to deal with a situation as it came to the Senate, and, in the absence of any tax provisions, we had to make the cost just as little as we could for the first few years in order to meet, as we thought, the objections of the President of the United States. If we add to that cost I am fearful that it will insure a veto, while if we do not I am still hopeful that there will be no veto.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator speaks with authority and says he is hopeful that if nothing is added to the bill it will be signed. Can the Senator give us any assurance the President will not veto this bill if the reclamation amendment should be stricken out?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have already answered that question, and in this way: The only answer is that the bill as now drawn, in my opinion at least, meets the only objection which was offered by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury when the bill, in 1921, was recommitted to the committee, namely, that it carried such an obligation that the Government would not be able to float its short-time obligations to take up those which were about to fall due. Now, with only from $78,000,000 to $100,000,000 called for in a year, and with the changed conditions, there is not the slightest doubt in the world but the country can do that thing. That is why I hope the President will sign the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want the Senator to reveal any private conference which he may have had with the President or others who are in authority, and he would not do so, I am sure, but can the Senator state to the Senate on what he bases his hope that the President will sign the bill? I am sure he has talked with the President about it.

Mr. McCUMBER. As I have just stated, because it meets the objection which was made by the President when, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury in 1921, the bill was recommitted to the committee. That is why I think he will sign it.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has heard reports, no doubt, as I have heard reports, from men for whom I have respect and whose word I value highly and who I know would not speak anything but what is the truth, to the effect that the President is going to veto this bill. The Senator has heard similar reports?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; and I have heard others say as positively that the President will not veto it in its present form.

Mr. HARRISON. So that the whole thing is up in the air.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is up in the air, but I hope to God the President will sign it.

Mr. HARRISON. I join in that hope.

Mr. McCUMBER. And I think he ought to sign it.

Mr. President, I think really I have stated all there is to this question. If we want to vote for the McNary matter or any other matter as an independent proposition, you can give the soldier any right you see fit under it, and I think probably we would all vote for a reclamation scheme that would not involve too heavy expenditures at the present time; but you can not get the two Houses to agree upon the same reclamation proposition, and it is wasting time to attempt to do so. I think the Senator from Oregon recognizes that, because he was before the committee, and a Member of the House was before the committee, and I think each of them recognized that it was impossible to put either of them through.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understood the Senator to say in conference, and practically to repeat in substance the same sentiment to-day, that in his opinion the President would veto this bill if the reclamation amendment were attached to it.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I have not stated that just in that way. I have stated that I believed that it would greatly endanger it, because of the fact that it would require such an additional amount of appropriation to carry it into effect above what the bill carries without the reclamation project.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I thought the Senator's expression was a little stronger than that. I thought he said that he had reason to believe, from intimations that came to him, that if the reclamation project was contained in the bill it was sure of a veto.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am fearful that that is exactly what would happen, and I am very hopeful that it would not happen if we should not attach the reclamation project, with its higher costs.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator will recall that my attitude on this matter in conference was affected by the statements made by the Senator from North Dakota to that effect.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to say just one more word about the matter if the bill should come back here with a veto. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has suggested, or the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], that if the bill should be vetoed by the President there would not be a sufficient number to overcome the veto. The vote in the Senate, Mr. President, was more than 2 to 1. I think the vote in the House was more than 2 to 1; and if those Senators who at heart want to help out the soldier will remain here upon their jobs until we get any final vote that is necessary, there are enough votes in the two Houses to make this bill the law.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree with the Senator, and I hope they will stay here.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope to God they will stay.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator, before he takes his seat, that he has said that while he does not know that the President will sign the adjusted compensation bill in its present form, according to this report, he hopes so; but he further states that to place in it this reclamation amendment, the McNary bill, would endanger its passage, and he believes that the President then might veto it.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. Upon what does the Senator base the statement that he would be likely to veto it if the McNary bill is incorporated in it and presented to him? He has time after time indorsed the McNary bill. He has promised the West to give them a reclamation proposition. This proposition is in the Republican platform, and the steering committee has considered it, and, as I understand, has placed it upon its program. If the steering committee has been for it, and said it should be passed, why should he now veto it? Would it not hasten the passage of the other proposition, because he might want to live up to at least one pledge that he had made?

Mr. McCUMBER. It seems to me that the President of the United States would be guided by this thought: He wanted a tax to take care of the soldiers' compensation bill. He wanted that tax because the original bill required a very heavy outlay of money in the first few years, when we had to float our obligations to take up short-time obligations. If we add a cost that will multiply the soldiers' compensation cost three times over, would not the President be more likely to veto it? What difference does it make whether there is $100,000,000 for the soldiers' compensation bill that is to be paid out of the general fund without additional taxes, or $500,000,000 or $350,000,000 that will go into some other line that will be paid out of the general fund of the Treasury without a tax? I can only reason as to what to me would seem to be a reasonable attitude to be taken by the President.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has no doubt, has he, that if we should pass the McNary reclamation bill as a separate measure and put it up to the President in the form in which it passed the Senate as an amendment, he would sign it?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know anything about that. I do not want to pass judgment on that, as I have not the slightest judgment about it.

Mr. HARRISON. If he should in that event sign it as a separate bill, is it not perfectly natural that he should sign it even as an amendment incorporated in this bill, because in no instance would the charge be heavier upon the Government? It would be the same whether it was incorporated in one bill or in two separate bills.

Mr. McCUMBER. I confess that I can not see why he would require a tax to take care of $100,000,000 and would not require any tax to take care of $350,000,000. I can not understand that reasoning; but that is for the President.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12472) to declare a national emergency to exist in the production, transportation, and distribution of coal and other fuel, granting additional powers to the Interstate Commerce Commission, providing for the appointment of a Federal Fuel Distributor, providing for the declaration of car-service priorities in interstate commerce during the present and any succeeding emergency, and to prevent extortion in the sale of fuel.

COMPENSATION OF WORLD WAR VETERANS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10874) to provide adjusted compensation for the veterans of the World War, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, we have not had cited a single precedent to warrant sustaining the decision of the Chair. The precedent cited by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] does not touch this case. That decision was about a case where the conferees on the part of the Senate had never been appointed. When a matter is going to conference, as I understand it, and somebody moves to instruct conferees, that can not be done until the conferees have been appointed. In this instance, however, conferees have been appointed; the conferees have been in conference with the conferees on the part of the House; the conferees come back to the Senate and make a report to the Senate, and while their report is up for consideration a Senator moves to disagree with what the conferees recommend, and the Senator from North Dakota makes the point of order that he can not do that, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

I challenge the opposition to cite one precedent that sustains such a ruling. Here we are, Mr. President, about to make a precedent against the soldiers of the country and all the farmers of the West. I submit that it is wrong; it is an outrage to make such a precedent in a case like this.

What is the proposition when a conference report is made to this body? What is the history of these proceedings? Here is what occurs: The chairman of the conference committee comes in. He rises and says, "Mr. President, I beg leave to submit the conference report on bill numbered so-and-so, and I move its adoption." That is what happens. I submit that neither the Senator from North Dakota nor any other Senator on the other side can claim that a motion to adopt this report was pending, because no such motion had ever been made.

The Senator from Mississippi, in the absence of a motion of that kind, moves to disagree. Does the Chair mean to hold that the Senate can not do what it pleases with this report until the final vote comes upon the question of agreeing to it?

The Senator from North Dakota said:

I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. President, what was that for? That was for Senators to say what they wanted to say about it while it was up for consideration before a vote came upon the motion to adopt the report of the conferees. Now we are treated to the very strange and interesting situation that a Senator can not move to reject what the conferees have done before those conferees have been discharged and before their work has been accepted; that the Senate is powerless because one man may rule that the Senate can do nothing but act upon the question as to whether or not it will accept outright whatever the conferees have agreed upon.

Mr. President, I submit that the Senate has a right to object to any particular part of the conference report and point out wherein it objects, and instruct the conferees to go back, or appoint new conferees, and have them contend for the proposition of putting in what the Senate insists shall be put in. I submit that it is a strange departure here from parliamentary procedure that is as old as the Government to contend that the Senate can not reject part of a conference report and instruct the conferees to insist upon something that the Senate has already agreed upon by solemn vote; and yet that is the effect of the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. President, I want to say again that the Senators on the other side, some of them astute parliamentarians, have failed to cite one precedent that fits this case. There is not one on record. I challenge them to produce one; and I submit that it is unfair, it is wrong, it is outrageous to make a precedent when we do it to the cost and to the injury of thousands and hundreds of thousands of people in the West and great Northwest and at the expense and to the injury of the soldiers of the country.

I want to say to Senators on the other side, before they vote on this question, that they have the opportunity here, by voting to disagree with the ruling of the Chair, to get some legislation on reclamation, and that is all they will have at this session, because this joint resolution that undertakes to take $5,000,000 out of the Treasury to turn over to Liberia for the purpose of paying debts to Wall Street is not going to pass. You might just as well put that down. It may go through this body, but it is not going to go through the other body.

It has a reclamation project in it. I am the friend of the reclamation interests, but I am not going to vote to take $5,000,000 out of the Treasury to pay private debts in Wall Street when we can not get any cash money to pay these soldiers who are in distress in this country. I do not care what else you put on the bill; I am not going to vote to take that $5,000,000 out of the Treasury and pay it over to these Wall Street interests. So if any Senators on the other side are hugging to their hearts the thought that they will get that $20,000,000 they are reckoning without their host, because that joint resolution is not going to become a law. We will not have any adjournment here for a long, long time if that thing is pressed and an effort is made to have it become a law. We might just as well consider the facts as they are.

Mr. President, I do not care to say any more upon this subject. There is another proposition in this bill, and that is to collect the interest due to the American people on ten billions of money loaned to the allied countries. That interest amounts now in all to $2,000,000,000, and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], with the solid Democratic vote of this body behind him, and with the aid of a few Republican votes, succeeded in having an amendment put on the bill providing that that interest should be collected, or enough of it to make these payments to the soldiers, without taxing the American people one 5-cent piece, without taking a nickel out of the Treasury, without selling bonds in the country, or issuing Federal reserve notes, as I have said before.

What have you done? You have stricken that provision out of the bill. I stated here a few days ago that it was the secret understanding amongst Republican leaders that you intend to cancel that debt; to cancel it when our people are involved as they have never been involved before; to cancel it when they are selling farms in the South and the West for taxes; to cancel it when men fairly well to do before you came into power have now to borrow money with which to pay their taxes.

That is what we are treated to, and here you are, with the Democratic Party leading to make the allied countries pay their interest in sufficient amount to take care of this payment, every payment, all of it, to the soldiers of the country without involving anything else. What did you do? You went into that conference committee and struck it out. Then when it went into the House not a Republican raised his voice in protest against striking out that provision, which would have brought to the Government a billion and a half dollars in cash to meet these payments, wipe clean the slate, and settle this debt with the soldiers.

Mr. President, where is the evidence of the intention on the part of the Republican Party now in power to collect this foreign debt? The Bible tells us that a tree is known by its fruit. Where is the fruit here that indicates that the Republicans intend to collect that interest? What did you do? The Republican House does not open its mouth in protest against striking out this provision to collect a billion and a half dollars with which to pay adjusted compensation to the soldiers.

The leaders in the Senate, where we did manage to have adopted an amendment providing for the collection of the debt, acquiesce, sit with folded arms and sealed lips, while your program is ready to slide through and excuse this payment of interest and put the burden upon the American people.

Why did not some Republican Member of the House raise his voice against denying us the opportunity to collect the interest on this foreign debt and using it to pay this adjusted compensation to our soldiers?

Why did they sit silent while the conference report was being discussed briefly and then vote to deny us the right to collect one and a half billion dollars of interest due us by foreign countries with which to pay our soldiers?

I want to ask, what secret understanding have you with foreign governments that causes you to do that? What wheel within a wheel in this Government makes the Government impotent before the powers of Europe to collect just obligations to 100,000,000 Americans? Who is it that has thus betrayed the interests of our Government to these foreign powers, burdened as we are to-day with taxes? God pity the American people if such conditions are to continue.

Mr. President, I do not know how serious Senators consider this proposition. They are going to have to consider it on the hustings this fall, and they are going to have to consider it at the polls. I want every man and woman who reads the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to-morrow or the next day, who reads the issue of this day, to ask these men upon the hustings, "Why was it you voted to tax the American people to pay adjusted compensation rather than collect money from foreign countries who owe us, as suggested by the Democrats, and pay it without taxing our people?" That is a question I want people to ask them, and that is a question that will be asked them, and ought to be asked.

Mr. President, how much better that would have been than this bill we have. I am going to vote for adjusted compensation. God knows I have fought for it all the time as well as I could fight. I have demanded action in favor of these boys ever since the curtain went down and the war ended in November, 1918. But here is a proposition to which you have strings tied. You have it fixed now so that the bankers who advance money on this scrip have a chance to make big interest out of these boys. Senators, they have done enough for us without our tying strings to the little we pay to them now. They have done enough for our Government without permitting people to speculate on them.

Oh, what a sad situation is presented. You have stricken out the provision the able Senator from North Carolina submitted, and which we put in by a solid Democratic vote. You have stricken it out, and you have substituted this other thing. If we could have had our way, the soldier would not have to go to the bank with his scrip. The payments would have been made promptly, dollar for dollar, because we provided a way that would not cost the American people anything, provided it out of a fund which I believe in my heart you have a secret understanding with foreign Governments to give away to them. I believe you intend to beat the American people out of that $12,000,000,000. I do not know what you are going to get in return. I do not know what influences are going to work in the coming election in your behalf.

It presents a very sad situation. If Lincoln could be here now, he would repeat with emphasis, "The crisis that I see approaching unnerves me, and I tremble for the safety of my country."

Can a political party in power so handle a foreign indebtedness of $12,000,000,000, half the indebtedness of the United States? They named five commissioners, partisans, every one of them a Republican. There is not a Democrat on the commission appointed to handle this foreign debt and to tell the countries beyond the seas what shall be done and what shall not be done with it, and the American people shall not know about it. It is not a bipartisan arrangement, composed of Republicans and Democrats, as it ought to be, as I said before, when the Republicans are in power, three Republicans and two Democrats. Yet the Republican Party in power passed this measure through the Senate and through the House without the usual provision that the commission should be bipartisan, which, of course, left the President free to appoint only Republicans to handle an indebtedness of $12,000,000,000, which it was well understood he would do. The President ought to have appointed two Democrats on so important a commission.

Great God, Mr. President and Senators, what will the country think of that when it finally knows it? Of course, some of the people in the country do not know it yet.

The subsidized press will not tell the truth to the country. I have said before, and I repeat now, that when I speak of the subsidized press I have no reference to these brave and honorable boys who represent the other and honest part of the press. I am speaking only of the hired press, the bought press, the corrupt press, which ought to be stopped from using the press gallery of the people's Capitol.

The time is coming when something is going to be done along that line. The time is coming when certain newspapers will be barred from that gallery. Mark what I say, the American people will not permit a few men to go out and buy up newspapers and have hired men sitting in the press gallery to play favorites, to play up those who are against the people, and try to ruin those who are for the people. They are not going to submit to it, and ought not to submit to it.

I know a Republican candidate for the Senate, recently defeated by a Senator in this body, a Republican, too, a clever gentleman, and the man who ran against him was a millionaire many times over. Do you know what he did? The first thing he did was to buy nine newspapers and have them all just shelling the woods, and they were praising that fellow who was not worth a snap of your finger. He was one of those purse-proud plutocrats who has made a lot of money, and that is all he has. He wanted to get a seat in the Senate where he supposed they were for sale.

Mr. President, he bought up nine newspapers, and the other fellow did not have any at all, but he went home and went through the State, and he spoke face to face with the people, and he beat that other man when he told them of the unfair game that was being practiced against him by men who had millions and could buy up these instrumentalities that take the news to the country.

All of our lives we have pleaded for a free press and free speech. Where have you any free press, when you have a press part of which is bought and hog tied by these interests? I know, regarding myself, of a newspaper man who is still in the Capitol. He told me a few years ago in the House that he said something complimentary of me to a newspaper man down South, and that newspaper man told him that they did not want anything favorable said about me.

Mr. President, I know their game, and I am going to fight it out with them. I have a duty to perform, and if I did not have the courage to perform it I ought not to be in this body. I am fighting the battles of my people, fighting for the good of my country. There are things that I could do which would yield me more money than I make as a Senator, but I have been honored by the people of my State as one of the Senators of the bravest and best people in all the world. They are entitled to the best service that I am capable of rendering, and I am going to give it to them. Whenever I find evil forces working against them here I am going to cry out against it. I am not going to consider whether it will hurt me or not. I will do my duty and then submit my cause to them, confident of their approval.

While I am on this subject I am going to make this statement. For two years I have discussed here the crime of deflation and said enough about it to fill a volume of 1,000 pages. That question was so serious to us in the South that Colonel Armstrong, of Fort Worth, Tex., wrote a book upon it, quoting a part of one of my speeches, and he called that book "The Crime of '20." He pictures in that book the ruin wrought in Texas and other Southern States and in the West. That subject had to do with the robbery of 60,000,000 people. I regret to say that but one fair report of what I have said upon that subject has gone out of this Capitol. Would you have believed that the press agencies at the Capital of the Nation here, hard by the spot where rests the remains of George Washington and where Thomas Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln moved in the days long gone, could have been induced to suppress the many grave and serious charges that I have made and proven regarding drastic deflations? Newspapers in the country have commented upon their failure to give these facts to the public. A general plan to suppress news in which the whole people are vitally interested is a serious thing, Senators. Mr. President, such a situation is enough to cause Senators to have some serious thoughts about conditions here. I know that the boys in the press gallery here have nothing against me personally. I have no ill will toward them. I believe if they had not been told not to send out the news regarding my speeches on deflation they would have given the news to the country. I know that certain interests are trying to suppress what I say. They do not want the country to know the truth about deflation, and they have managed to keep a good deal of it out of the press.

Every man who has read my speech and the speech of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] indorses my position. I have had many letters to that effect. That shows that if the American people had both sides of the question they would agree with me. They are going to have both sides of it, mark that.

I had a letter the other day from a civic organization in one of the largest cities of the country which said: "We understand you are not getting a fair deal in the matter of newspaper reports." I said, "That is true." "We understand that you made some statements in the Senate about the influences keeping your statements out of the columns of the press." I said, "That is true," and I sent them a copy of my speech. They condemned the action of the papers and issued a bulletin upon the subject. Other concerns are taking it up and writing me and asking me just what influences I think are working at the Capital to keep the people from knowing the truth.

Senators, keeping the people from knowing the truth about issues here is a crime against the American people. Think of it! Here are things going on that affect them vitally and the news can not get to them. Why, Mr. President, I showed here the other day a thing astonishing to every Senator who heard it and I have not seen a line of it in any newspaper. I have had the papers looked over and the story is not there. I showed here in my speech that the New York Federal Reserve Bank alone paid more salaries to its officials than the Government paid to the President and his Cabinet, the Vice President and the Senate, the Speaker of the House and the 435 Members of that body, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, the War Finance Corporation, the General of the Army and the Admiral of the Navy, and not a paper carried a line of it. That would not only be interesting but eye-opening news to the people of the country.

If this money was not sidetracked and squandered in that way, 90 per cent of it, after running expenses and dividends were paid, would go into the Federal Treasury and help to relieve the people of some of their tax burdens.

Why is such a news item suppressed? Who is it that dares to suppress such news right here in the Nation's Capitol? Is the Republican Party hand in glove with this bunch that undertakes to suppress the truth and keep the people in the dark while they are being bound to the chariot wheels of the mighty money lords of Wall Street? It is fortunate that we have a CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that the plutocrats of Wall Street and elsewhere can not blue-pencil. Those who get the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD have an opportunity to read what we are doing and saying here.

Regardless of their efforts to mistreat and injure me, I have a duty to perform, and so have you, Senators. If I should sit here and smile at these interests and say nothing except what they wanted me to say, do you know what they would do? Why, they would say nice things about me. But since I chose to stand for what I thought was fair and right and just, and pointed out some of their crooked conduct, they have passed the word that "he must be attacked and what he says suppressed." So the Wall Street papers have been attacking me. One of them said the other day that Senator GLASS's speech should silence me. One clever newspaper boy from the gallery came down the other afternoon, when I had finished, and said, "Well, you have knocked them out. You have proven by the figures that they did deflate. They said they had not, and you have shown that they did." That boy gave me the fairest report I have had since I have been making this fight for two years.

In that speech I challenged the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of this body, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], a very wealthy man, a man who indorses deflation, a man who opposed the Federal reserve banking system when the law was enacted, but a man who now defends deflation and is satisfied with the operation of the system under the control of Wall Street, from whose clutches we tore the banking power under Woodrow Wilson in 1913.

I challenged him to answer those figures of mine, and I challenged the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] to answer them. I set out in figures that can not be disproved that they deflated $2,500,000,000 during the dreadful months of deflation. I submit to the Senate and to the country that every newspaper that has a representative in the press gallery of this body owes it to me and to the people whose fight I have made to come out squarely and say "Senator HEFLIN has proven his charge. Nobody can answer his figures." Is not that fair, Senators, and just to the sixty-odd million people whose fight I have made? I charged here two years ago that the currency was contracted and credits deflated to the extent of several hundred million dollars, and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] not only denied my charge, but stated that increased currency and credit aid was given during that period of about a billion dollars.

I have shown that statement to be absolutely incorrect, and that instead of supplying increased aid the Federal reserve banks withdrew during that time in currency and credits about $1,000,000,000, and that for the whole period of deflation they contracted and deflated to the extent of $2,500,000,000. Am I not entitled to have the people of the country know that I have proven my charge? I have dared to tell how Wall Street interests made hundreds of millions of dollars through deflation. If I were afraid that some newspaper would slander me and lie about me, as some New York papers do and have, I would not be worthy to represent the people of my State in this body.

Mr. President, the effort is made here constantly to get hold of a new man when he comes into this body and give him soothing sirup and silence powders and rock him and lull him to sleep and take all the fight out of him, convert him from an aggressive, able, gallant fighter, if he is such, into one of these namby-pamby, arm-folding, do-nothing, whispering kind. I have a mighty good example for mere man to follow. Christ in the city of Jerusalem found that the money changers and dove sellers, who used to do business on the street down near the market place, had become so bold and arrogant that they moved off the street right into the temple. The Master walked in and found them bartering their wares in the Temple of God. What did He do? Did He say, "Gentlemen, I rather suspect or, indeed, I think that you are doing wrong and I would like for you to get out"? No; He became indignant and angry, and with cords in His hands He lashed them out of the temple.

Now, what is our duty? What is the duty of a Senator in this body sworn to support and defend the institutions of his country against all enemies? What does that mean—all enemies, both foreign and domestic? What is meant by that? It meant exactly what it said. Who are the enemies of the country? I know when this Wall Street crowd came down to the Capitol——

[At this point a message from the House of Representatives announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on House bill 7456, the tariff bill.]

Mr. HEFLIN. That is more food for thought. Mr. President, who are these enemies of the country? I saw a band of marching marauders storm the Capitol and compel the Republican Congress to take off of the tax books $90,000,000 of money that would have helped to bear the burdens of the Government in its time of stress and strain. I saw the profiteers come here taking down $450,000,000 more. How much that would have helped in this time of sore trial with regard to money? I saw those remnants left of war contracts, many of them questionable, a band of fellows who marched upon the Capitol and took down $700,000,000 more. I said they who took advantage of our country in the time of its peril and held it up and robbed it are the enemies of the country. They came here into the temple of liberty and laid their plans to rob the people and bestow favors upon the mighty rich and unload their burdens upon the backs of the struggling poor and then proceeded to suppress the news so that the people would be kept in the dark.

Then, Mr. President, the Democrats suggested, when they found the Republicans were trying to cancel a debt that foreign countries owe us and are amply able to pay—most of them—when the Democrats found that a Republican administration had named a commission of five Republicans to handle the debt, they knew what it meant. We protested against it at the time; I denounced the scheme when the Republicans had it up in this body; but the President named those Republicans; a Republican Senate confirmed them; and they are now in charge of the collection of that indebtedness.

Are we to get an idea of what the Republicans intend to do by what has transpired subsequently? Let us see. A Republican President named a Republican commission, and a Republican Senate confirmed them by a vote in the Senate. The Democrats came here and asked the Republicans to let us collect the interest of $2,000,000,000 on that foreign debt to the United States of $10,000,000,000, in order to pay the soldier his compensation as the payments were due. What did the Republicans do? In the conference committee, where the Republicans were in the majority, they struck that provision out, and no Republican in the other House, so far as I can find from the RECORD, lifted his voice in protest against it. What would that indicate to a discerning mind, to a man who had an inquiring mind, and who said, "I wish to see what the Republican attitude is on the subject of the collection of this foreign debt"?

If he should find that the Democrats had been insisting all along that the debt be collected; if he should find a commission being appointed to handle its collection; that the Democrats, who had been elected by part of the people of the country, were insisting that Democrats be on the commission, while the Republicans in power had turned down that view and put only Republicans upon it, he would say it would look as though something were wrong.

After that was done, and the Democrats by a solid vote in the Senate forced upon the adjusted compensation bill a provision to collect the interest on that debt in order to pay the soldiers the cash—the cold, hard cash—the conferees on the bill went behind closed doors in a conference committee and the Republicans by sheer, brute force struck it out. What would one think they intended to do? If he had any sense, he would think they did not intend to collect the debt, and that is what it means, of course.

When the bill contains a provision to collect the debt and the Republican majority vote out that provision, that means they do not intend to collect it. The Republicans having voted it out, where do they leave the foreign indebtedness? Just where it was before—not a nickel of it collected; with no machinery in existence for collecting it; and, instead of collecting a billion and a half dollars in order to take care of the payments to the soldiers, the Republican majority have stricken it out and propose to unload that debt upon the backs of the American people, with strings tied to it, so that the bankers can make money out of the distress of the soldier. God pity the Republican Party!

What do they think would happen if we should get the truth to the country? Suppose we had a fair deal in the press, as we shall have not many months hence? We shall then have a couple of news agencies here which I think will give all the news. One of them may be called the All American News Agency. Such an agency ought to be able to get all the news out to the country. Let every Senator here keep tab on it and let the subscribers of those newspapers which do not carry the news know how they are being treated. Did Senators ever consider that side of the question? There is not a newspaper in the country which can live an hour if those who subscribe to it and read it stop doing so. Talk about a strike! If the reading public of some of these corrupt sheets would quit and strike on them, they would bring them to their senses. To what is a man entitled who subscribes to a newspaper? Suppose he lives in my State and I am up here making a fight in his interest and I am pointing out the crooks who have robbed and plundered him and trying to prevent the recurrence of such a thing in the future? He is entitled to know what I have said. That is a matter of news. What ought the subscribers to the newspaper that will not print that do to it? They ought to quit subscribing to it—cancel their subscriptions.

How do the newspapers make money? Those that advertise are trying to reach the people who read newspapers. So, after all, it is the man who reads the paper who makes the machinery go. But for him, as my able and brilliant friend from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] knows, none of the newspapers could live an hour. He is the one the advertising man is after when he comes in and pays to one of the newspaper editors thousands and thousands of dollars a year for space for advertising. He is doing that in order to put his goods before the people who read the paper. If the subscribers quit taking the newspaper, it dies. I have known a few of them to die in my time.

Certain fair-play leagues say they will help make the fight for a fair deal in the matter of giving the news to the public.

Mr. President, there are enough honest, patriotic men and women in America to make the fight to free this Government, to unloose its helpful instrumentalities again, so that the average man and woman may have once more a fair chance in the struggle for existence. The day is not far distant when we shall have a free press again. The subsidized press, as my friend from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] stated a day or two ago regarding the "life termers," was never intended to control this country. A people worth saving will not permit a corrupt subsidized press to take the place of an honest free press. I plant myself upon that doctrine, and I am willing to stand or fall with it. I welcome any sort of a battle that may come out of it. All I ask is a fair deal.

As Senators come to this body and wear their lives out fighting for right and justice, I sometimes wonder how some of the newspaper men feel when they lie down at night and ask themselves the question at the court of their conscience, "Am I treating this man right? He is fighting for a just cause, and he ought to have my friendly aid instead of an unfriendly stab in the back." That is the thought that ought to come home to some of them.

I am the friend of the fair and honest newspapers; I think they are great agencies for good. I bid Godspeed to them; but, Mr. President, I have been attacked by inspired newspapers so far from this Capitol that a wayfaring man would know that they had been "touched" by the interests that I have condemned.

What is my fight? My fight has been against the crime of deflation. What did it do? It destroyed property values by the billions in the United States. I am for human rights and I am for property rights; but I want to say to some Senators here who do not seem to realize it that to the little farmer out upon the hillside or down by the creek bank or the river's edge, his one-horse farm, his 40 acres of land, his 10 bales of cotton, his little crib of corn, the little meat in his smokehouse, sirup in his barrel, and a few of the other necessities of life mean as much to him as do the speculator's millions tossed on the gambling table each day in Wall Street, New York. Mr. President, when deflation comes like some mighty besom of destruction and swoops down upon that farmer and takes his substance from his crib, from his smokehouse, his cotton from the warehouse, and then lastly takes his home, his farm, and leaves him with debt still hanging over him, the man responsible for that criminal catastrophe is a thief; he is an enemy of my country and I propose to pursue him and hold him up to public scorn until the country condemns him and repudiates him.

I make the statement here again that I do not believe that the President will disappoint the American people in this matter and reappoint Governor Harding. But if he should reappoint him any Senator in this body, I do not care who he is, who votes to confirm him ought to be defeated, and in my judgment will be defeated when the people know the damaging facts in Governor Harding's bad record.

When the show-down comes and the question is asked, Who is on the Lord's side, where pillaging and plundering the American people for the benefit of Wall Street is the issue, how are you going to vote? I wonder, Mr. President, on a roll call, how many there would be in this body who would vote for Wall Street over the protests of the great grain-growing West. I wonder who in this body would vote for him over the protests of the honest men and women of the South, who have suffered so much through drastic deflation? But some Wall Street financiers seem to think they can buy his reappointment. Who will pay most to have renamed this man who has juggled with the greatest financial system ever created in the Government of man. Certain financiers said, "I will not contribute to your campaign fund until you put this man back on the board." Back where? Where he inaugurated the system, or led it after Republicans had inaugurated it, of sending money into Wall Street, making millionaires over night, to the injury and the ruin of the business of millions of people in the South, West, and Middle West.

Mr. President, what do you suppose Hickory Jackson would have done if in his day a daily paper had heralded forth the statement from a big money lord that he would not contribute to the campaign fund unless the President would change his mind, and let him have the man who led the marauding horde and robbed 60,000,000 people for the benefit of a few thousand in the East? What do you suppose Old Hickory would have done? What he would have said about that fellow, and what he would have given the country to understand about the situation, would have been very heartening indeed. I can imagine now that I can see Old Hickory when a man went into the White House and told him: "Read that, Mr. President. Here is a fellow who says he will not give anything to the campaign fund until you reappoint a man who has been worth millions to him and others by deflation." I have in mind just what Old Hickory would have said, but I am not going to say it.

Mr. President, that is a disgusting situation with which to confront 4,000,000 soldiers who offered to die for their country.

I want to drop this thought before I finish:

This banking system was not devised for the benefit of the bankers. It was intended to be helpful to all. It was devised for the purpose of blessing and benefiting the whole American people. I remember what President Wilson said in a letter to my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] when that bill became the law. He rejoiced, in his letter to my colleague, that we had broken the power of Wall Street and had freed this great banking system from the clutches of that control; and now what has happened to it? It has gone back. They have control of it, and the very fellows who opposed its enactment are now well pleased with it and the head of it, who had a change of heart and came over to be their subservient tool, until this man writes down and says that he can not give any more money unless they will rename the present head of the system and let it rock along as it rocked before.

Mr. President, some of these things ought to be said. They ought to go in this RECORD, so that the people who read each day 40,000 copies of this RECORD, going into the various sections, can find out what is going on here. Little by little and bit by bit they can spread the news, until it will affect first a precinct, then a county, then a State, and then the United States. A good cause can not be suppressed. If those who fight for it are faithful, it will surely win in the end.

Mr. President, I have felt impelled to make these statements by what has transpired to-day. The reclamation project is kicked into the air; the collection of the interest on the foreign debt is thrown aside and an arrangement through which bankers can make money out of the soldier is held up in its stead.

Mr. President, it is a sad situation to contemplate. I never thought this thing would be practiced against the soldier. I never thought an attempt would be made to establish a precedent on a situation that affected him as vitally as this. I want to move to instruct the conferees to go back and stay until the snow flies, or settle this question that these boys are going to have some of this cash due this Government that they saved, due from the governments that they saved. No country over there, nor our own country here, would be in existence to-day but for the valor and heroism of these men, and yet they are pushed off, back, back, back, the last to be served, and when they are served money is denied them, reclamation lands in the West are denied them, and scrip is put up in their stead; and on top of that we are told that the President will veto the whole measure, and after all the soldier must take his hat under his arm, and with bowed head and folded hands and slow and solemn tread walk back into utter forgetfulness, so far as these men are concerned. I want to say to him that such a judgment is not the judgment of the American people. It is the conjured-up trickery of those in power and does not reflect the minds of the men and women of America.

Mr. President, these men saved my country. They brought back that flag flying in the air of victory. They bore it with manly tread down Pennsylvania Avenue while thousands applauded and cheered them; and after the march was over, and after the flag was furled, and after the night had fallen, these men passed off this stage of display, and they were driven back and the curtain pulled down over them, and they had to wait until every profiteering interest in the country was served, and now they are confronted with a situation that is displeasing indeed.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If the Senate and the House concurring should pass a real soldiers' bonus bill at this very late day, when so many of the soldiers who escaped German gas and bombs and bullets are dead, I hope that as a part of the epitaphs marking the graves of these men who died with broken hearts and broken expectations will be a copy of the President's veto message.

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, Mr. President, I pray that this measure will not be vetoed. This thing that we have is far better than nothing. I have spoken many a time here to try to get cash payments made by the collection of this money from foreign countries. We had it provided for. The House should have stood out and contended for it. The leadership of the Republican Party in that body ought to have stood there and fought until the snow flies to hold that provision in the bill; but it was stricken out. One morning at the breakfast table I picked up the Washington Post and read the headlines, "Collection of interest on foreign debt is stricken out by conferees." Mr. President, it made me sad, because I saw in it a scheme to deny to these boys the cash that those payments would have given them. I saw in it the hidden, subterranean scheme to cancel this foreign debt; and when the conferees reported, and I saw that this was not merely newspaper report, but was an actual accomplishment, I said: "I will make the motion to instruct the conferees to insist upon the provision which requires the collection of the interest on the money due us by foreign countries and use it in paying adjusted compensation to our soldiers. I now suggest, Mr. President, that the conferees be instructed to go back to the conference committee room and ask, on the part of the House, the appointment of another committee to replace this one that they have disbanded so soon in the interest of foreign cancellation, take this matter under consideration, fight this thing out, collect this money, and pay these boys. We had provided a way to pay every dollar of adjusted compensation to our soldiers without taxing the American people one cent and you have stricken it out.

I said before, and I am going to repeat, that two of these countries, France and England alone, have paid Wall Street private interests $1,700,000,000 in the last few months. Why can they not pay us a billion and a half? We saved their lives. What hold has this great money power, that the Republican Party is impotent to break away and refuse to follow the bidding of these men of Wall Street?

Why, Senators, I would go to them and say: "You took $90,000,000 of big income tax, you took $450,000,000 of profiteering tax, you took $700,000,000 for war contracts that were questionable, many of them, and here you are not satisfied yet! You reaped fortunes through deflation in the South; you fed and fattened upon the ruin wrought by deflation in the West; but you are not satisfied yet, and now you come and demand of us, sworn to represent the people of this country, to dismiss this movement to collect interest on the foreign debt to provide a shelter for the soldier, clothing for his back, and food for his mouth. We will not do it. We are going to stand by this program." That is what you ought to tell them.

Mr. President, those who served their country faithfully live on. The timeserver dies in a day. The soldier offered his all. By his side his comrade fell and baptized with his blood the soil of France. The surviving soldier, neglected, mistreated, will live on in the hearts of some of us, the men and women of the country who represent the great, throbbing heart of humanity in this western world.

Mr. President, Ben Hill, of Georgia—so well and ably represented in the present Senate by the Senator from that State and his colleague—uttered these immortal words:

Who saves his country saves all things, and all things saved do bless him;
But he who lets his country die lets all things die; and all things, dying, curse him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. HARRISON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HEFLIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator withhold his suggestion until we can have the yeas and nays ordered?

Mr. HEFLIN. Very well.

Mr. McCUMBER. The suggestion of the absence of a quorum has been made. There is but one thing to do and that is to call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I was not present when the Chair made his ruling; I was in a conference committee meeting. Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, in view of the action of the Senate in sustaining the decision of the Chair, it would be a useless consumption of time to submit the motion I had intended to make, and therefore I shall not press it.

FRIDAY, September 15, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father who art in heaven, we thank Thee that nothing shall be able to separate us from the love of God. We bless Thee that Thou art patient to listen and willing to hear. We praise Thee for the mercies that enrich human life. Thy resources are infinite—bread enough for the hungry, wisdom for the erring, strength for the faltering, comfort for the sorrowing, and eternal life for the dying. O fill our hearts with Thy truth and our minds with Thy light. Guard our country, defend its laws, bless all institutions for the diffusion of knowledge, for the maintenance of rectitude and justice. O may its light shine as an example for all peoples, and may the whole earth be our vineyard, and to do good our religion. Through Christ. Amen.

FEDERAL FUEL DISTRIBUTOR—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on H. R. 12472, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up the conference report on H. R. 12472 and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana reserves all points of order on the conference report. The Clerk will report the statement.

The statement was read.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12472) to declare a national emergency to exist in the production, transportation, and distribution of coal and other fuel, granting additional powers to the Interstate Commerce Commission, providing for the appointment of a Federal fuel distributor, providing for the declaration of car-service priorities in interstate commerce during the present and any succeeding emergency, and to prevent extortion in the sale of fuel, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"That by reason of the prolonged interruption in the operation of a substantial part of the coal-mining industry in the United States and of the impairment in the service of certain carriers engaged in commerce between the States and by reason of the disturbance in economic and industrial conditions caused by the World War a national emergency exists which endangers the public health and general welfare of the people of the United States, injures industry and business generally throughout the United States, furnishes an opportunity for the disposition of coal and other fuel at unreasonably high prices, limits the supply of heat, light, and power, threatens to obstruct and hamper the operation of the Government of the United States and of its several departments, the transportation of the mails, the operation and efficiency of the Army and the Navy, and the operation of carriers engaged in commerce among the several States and with foreign countries."

"SEC. 2. That the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as amended, including the transportation act, 1920, and especially under section 402 of said transportation act, 1920, are, during the aforesaid emergency, enlarged to include the authority to issue in transportation of coal or other fuel orders for priorities in car service, embargoes, and other suitable measures in favor of or against any carrier, including vessels suitable for transportation of coal on the inland waters of the United States which for such purpose shall be subject to the interstate commerce act, or region, municipality, community, or person, copartnership, or corporation, and to take any other necessary and appropriate steps for the priority in transportation and for the equitable distribution of coal or other fuel so as best to meet the emergency and to promote the general welfare, and to prevent upon the part of any person, partnership, association, or corporation the purchase or sale of coal or other fuel at prices unjustly or unreasonably high. This act shall not be construed as repealing any of the powers heretofore granted by law to the Interstate Commerce Commission but shall be construed as conferring supplementary and additional powers to said commission and as an amendment to section 1 of the interstate commerce act, and subject to the limitations and definitions of commerce controlled by said act, and all powers given said Interstate Commerce Commission shall be applicable in the execution of this act.

"SEC. 3. Because of such emergency and to assure an adequate supply and an equitable distribution of coal and other fuel, and to facilitate the movement thereof between the several States and with foreign countries, to supply the Army and Navy, the Government of the United States and its several departments, and carriers engaged in interstate commerce with the same during such emergency, and for other purposes, and for the further purpose of assisting in carrying into effect the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission made under existing law or under section 2 hereof there is hereby created and established an agency of the United States to be known as Federal fuel distributor, whose appointment shall be made and compensation fixed by the President of the United States. Said distributor shall perform his duties under the direction of the President.

"SEC. 4. It shall be the duty of the Federal fuel distributor to ascertain—

"(a) Whether there exists within the United States or any part thereof a shortage of coal or other fuel and the extent of such shortage;

"(b) The fields of production of coal and other fuel and the principal markets to which such production is or may be transported and distributed and the means and methods of distribution;

"(c) The prices normally and usually charged for such coal and other fuel and whether current prices, considering the costs of production and distribution, are just and reasonable; and

"(d) The nature and location of the consumers; what persons, copartnerships, corporations, regions, municipalities, or communities should, under the acts to regulate commerce administered by the Interstate Commerce Commission, including the transportation act, 1920, in time of shortage of coal and other fuel, or the transportation thereof, receive priority in transportation and distribution, and the degree thereof, and any other facts relating to the production, transportation, and distribution of coal and other fuel; and when so ascertained the Federal fuel distributor shall make appropriate recommendations pertaining thereto to the Interstate Commerce Commission from time to time either on his own motion or upon request of the commission, to the end that an equitable distribution of coal and other fuel may be secured so as best to meet the emergency and promote the general welfare. All facts and data within the possession of the Federal fuel distributor shall be at all times accessible and furnished to the Interstate Commerce Commission upon its request. The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby authorized and directed to receive and consider the recommendation of the Federal fuel distributor, based upon his reports upon the foregoing subject, and any other information which it may secure in any manner authorized by law.

"SEC. 5. The Federal fuel distributor may make such rules, regulations, and orders as he may deem necessary to carry out the duties imposed upon him by this act and may cooperate with any department or agency of the Government, any State, Territory, district or possession, or department, agency, or political subdivision thereof, or any person or persons, and may avail himself of the advice and assistance of any department, commission, or board of the Government, and may appoint or create any agent or agency to facilitate the power and authority herein conferred upon him; and he shall have the power to appoint, remove, and fix the compensation of such assistants and employees, not in conflict with existing laws, and make such expenditures for rent, printing, telegrams, telephones, furniture, stationery, office equipment, travel, and other operating expenses as shall be necessary for the due and effective administration of this act. All facts, data, and records relating to the production, supply, distribution, and transportation of coal and other fuel in the possession of any commission, board, agency, or department of the Government shall at all times be available to the Federal fuel distributor and the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the person having custody of such facts, data, and records shall furnish the same promptly to the Federal fuel distributor or his duly authorized agent or to the commission on request therefor.

"SEC. 6. That whenever the President shall be of the opinion that the national emergency hereby declared has passed, he shall by proclamation declare the same, and thereupon, except as to prosecutions for offenses, this act shall no longer be in force or effect, and in no event shall it continue in force and effect for longer than 12 months from the passage thereof.

"SEC. 7. Every person or corporation who shall knowingly make any false representation to the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Federal fuel distributor or to any person acting in their behalf or the behalf of either of them, respecting the price at which coal or other fuel has been, is being, or is to be sold or bought, the inquiry being made for the purposes of this act, or whoever having obtained coal or other fuel through a priority order or direction shall dispose of the same for purposes other than those for which said priority order or direction was issued without the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000: Provided, That any person or any officer or director of any corporation subject to the provisions of this act, or the interstate commerce act and the acts amendatory thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by any such corporation, who shall be convicted as aforesaid, shall, in addition to the fine herein provided for, be liable to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term not exceeding two years, in the discretion of the court. Every violation of this section may be prosecuted in any court of the United States having jurisdiction of crimes within the district in which such violation is committed, or through which the transportation is conducted, or in which the car service is performed, or in which such concession or discrimination is granted or given or solicited or accepted or received; and whenever the offense is begun in one jurisdiction and completed in another it may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in either jurisdiction in the same manner as if the offense had been actually and wholly committed therein.

"SEC. 8. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $250,000, available until expended, for the purposes of this act, including payment of personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and all expenses incident to organizing the work of the President's fuel distribution committee, and not exceeding $50,000 thereof shall be available for reimbursement and payment upon specific approval of the President of expenses incurred since May 15, 1922, in connection with the work of the President's fuel distribution committee organized for the purpose of helping to meet the emergency existing in the matter of fuel."

And the Senate agree to the same.

The title has been amended to conform to the text as agreed upon in conference as follows:

"To declare a national emergency to exist in the production, transportation, and distribution of coal and other fuel, granting additional powers to the Interstate Commerce Commission, providing for the appointment of a Federal fuel distributor, providing for the declaration of car-service priorities during the present emergency, and to prevent the sale of fuel at unjust and unreasonably high prices."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

As contrasted with the Senate amendment to H. R. 12472, the changes of any considerable importance in the conferees' amendment are about as follows:

The word "extortion" has been eliminated from the bill and the words "unjustly or unreasonably high" were substituted.

As provided in the conferees' amendment, section 4 includes the following new matter:

"Vessels suitable for transportation of coal on the inland waters of the United States which for such purposes shall be subject to the interstate commerce act."

Section 6 increases the length of the period through which the emergency declared to exist under this act can continue from 6 months to 12 months from the date of passage.

Section 7 eliminates the following language from the original House bill:

"Every person or corporation who shall knowingly offer, grant, or give, or solicit, accept, or receive any concession or discrimination in respect of car service as the same is defined in paragraph (10) of section 1 of the interstate commerce act, in violation of any order, direction, or rule of the Interstate Commerce Commission in respect thereto, or who shall by any willful misrepresentation or by any fraudulent device or means whatsoever, procure or cause to be issued any order or direction for priority hereunder," and substitutes the following:

"Every person or corporation who shall knowingly make any false representation to the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Federal fuel distributor or to any person acting in their behalf or the behalf of either of them, respecting the price at which coal or other fuel has been, is being, or is to be sold or bought, the inquiry being made for the purposes of this act."

In other respects restores the penalties, etc., set forth in the original House bill.

Section 8 restores the provision for the use of $50,000 to be made available for reimbursement and payment, upon specific approval of the President, of expenses incurred since May 15, 1922, in connection with the work of the President's fuel distribution committee.

SAMUEL E. WINSLOW,
WALTER H. NEWTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks if the gentleman from Indiana has any point of order to present he ought to make it now.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, under the reservation of the point of order I should like to have the chairman of the committee [Mr. WINSLOW] inform me with reference to the meaning of the new matter which the statement says is in section 4.

Mr. WINSLOW. That is an error which I intended to correct. It is in section 2.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I could not find it in section 4.

Mr. WINSLOW. That is quite right, but it is a typographical error.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I should like to ask the gentleman what is the reason for that provision?

Mr. WINSLOW. The reason is merely to comprehend within the terms of the act any facilities of transportation which may have to do with handling coal and which may increase or retard the efficiency of coal distribution. The provision was included in the Senate amendment, but not in the original House bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The language is as follows:

Including vessels suitable for transportation of coal on the inland waters of the United States which for such purposes shall be subject to the interstate commerce act.

What is meant by that?

Mr. WINSLOW. This means that whatever vessels may be coal carriers and available for that purpose and come within the provisions of the interstate commerce act are included in this act.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I should like to inquire from the chairman of the committee whether the effect of that added new language is to say to a shipper of coal who transports by water, "Unless you fix the price of coal in accordance with the ideas of the fuel administration we shall prevent the use of the vessel for that purpose"?

Mr. WINSLOW. I think the real purpose of it is to afford the same protection and the same privileges and the same control by the Interstate Commerce Commission of vessels on the water transporting coal as to cars on the rails.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the conferees exceeded their authority in adding to section 2 the following new matter. The Chair will find in the statement of the managers on the part of the House, at about the seventh line, the part to which I am referring, and that part reads as follows:

Vessels suitable for transportation of coal on the inland waters of the United States which for such purposes shall be subject to the interstate commerce act.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that that provision is in the amendment of the Senate? It is merely language taken out of the Senate amendment.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I am taking the statement of the conferees. The statement itself says:

Section 4 includes the following matter: "Vessels suitable for transportation of coal on the inland waters of the United States which for such purposes shall be subject to the interstate commerce act."

Mr. WINSLOW. The statement that it is new matter is an error. What was meant was that it was in contrast with the House bill, which did not have that matter in it, and the Senate bill did.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to have the gentleman from Indiana point out the words in the conference report to which he makes his point of order.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. They are in section 2. The report inadvertently calls it section 4. The gentleman from Massachusetts now states that the statement in the report that it is new matter is not correct. Of course, if the Senate bill contains that matter, it is not subject to the point of order, and I shall be glad to have that read. I just assumed that the statement that it was new matter was correct.

Mr. WINSLOW. If the gentleman will yield, it will be my pleasure to read from the Senate bill, section 2, lines 11 and 12:

Including vessels suitable for transportation of coal on the inland waters of the United States which for such purposes shall be subject to the interstate commerce act.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the chairman of the committee that the statement of the conferees was inaccurate and that this language is in the Senate bill, of course the point of order will not lie and I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws the point of order. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair kindly inform me as to any arrangement for time?

The SPEAKER. So far as the Chair knows there is no arrangement. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to one hour.

Mr. WINSLOW. The purpose, then, will be to yield one-half hour to the ranking minority member of the committee, who is present, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman wish to make any arrangement about the time?

Mr. WINSLOW. One hour, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], a member of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the gentleman from Massachusetts has the right at the end of one hour to move the previous question, or the gentleman can ask unanimous consent that after one hour of general debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that debate on the conference report be limited to one hour, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], and that at the end of that time the previous question be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, the statement of the managers on the part of the House can be found following the printed conference report. It is simple, straightforward, and apparently somewhat inaccurate, but the inaccuracies are typographical and not vital. They are probably mistakes of those who undertook to read the writing which was submitted to the printer.

The comparison which the committee undertook to make was between the Senate bill and the bill as reported by the conferees. We did not undertake to handle the whole Senate bill item by item, but merely to point out what seemed to be differences which would attract anybody's attention, with the understanding, of course, that the House conferees will be very glad indeed to answer any inquiries which may be made.

The word "extortion" appeared in the House bill and did not appear in the Senate bill. After talking it over we came to the conclusion unanimously that perhaps the purposes of the bill would be just as well served by cutting out the word "extortion" and introducing in lieu thereof the words "unjustly or unreasonably high." At all events those words pleased everybody, and the word "extortion" did not appeal particularly to anybody. So the agreement was made as indicated.

We have already discussed the suggestion in section 2 (inadvertently stated in the statement to be section 4) in respect of putting vessels on the waters which might carry coal under the provisions of this act, and for the same purposes as those respecting cars on the rails.

We changed the length of time during which this emergency might be considered as existing from 6 months in the Senate bill to 12 months in the conference report. That was merely the result of the discussion, and it was thought it would be a safer time and not too long.

The change in section 7 in the conferees' bill consists in the elimination of certain language which seemed to be objected to strenuously on the part of the Senate conferees.

The argument can be boiled down as being to the effect that they thought the purposes of the bill were not such as to make it wise to bring down possible punishment on classes that might come under the act if the original language were insisted upon as in the House bill. Hence the elimination of those lines as indicated and the substituting of a few others which serve merely as an introduction to the matter of the conferees' report which follows, and probably do not affect the meat of the bill at all.

In the Senate bill there was the omission of an item of $50,000 which in the House bill was provided for the purpose of remunerating those departments of the Government which on account of the stress of the emergency had advanced money in anticipation of some legislative action, for the purpose of controlling the coal troubles that we were having from the date beginning on the 15th of May. There was no discussion at all over this point. The conferees were unanimous as to the wisdom of the provision.

Mr. Speaker, with these suggestions it appears to me that there is nothing more to be said. All the previous points of the bill were pretty thoroughly discussed several days ago, and it does not differ essentially from the original bill.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. WINSLOW. With pleasure.

Mr. WINGO. I notice on the first page of your conference report you say "in lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following." Is that intended to be the text of the law that you are proposing to have the House adopt?

Mr. WINSLOW. That is the preamble in a sense.

Mr. WINGO. You say that that is the preamble. In the report occurs this sentence, which was not in the House bill, as I recall. I read the matter I have reference to:

And by reason of the disturbances in economic and industrial conditions caused by the World War.

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I notice in the printed report of the text of the amendment you include that language, but I also notice in the bill, page 8, where that language should go in, line 21, it does not appear. Which is correct, the conference report or the text of the bill?

Mr. WINSLOW. I do not catch the gentleman's point.

Mr. WINGO. I notice that the printed copy of the bill and the conferees' amendment written in the report do not agree. Which is correct?

Mr. WINSLOW. What is the document the gentleman refers to?

Mr. WINGO. I refer to the conference report, and I have H. R. 12472.

Mr. WINSLOW. That is what we are correcting; that is the Senate bill.

Mr. WINGO. Then the correct text—what we are to accept—is printed in italics?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes; that part referred to is taken from the House bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In section 2 of the conference report is an amendment clothing the Interstate Commerce Commission with additional power. In section 3 of the bill you provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby directed to receive and consider recommendations of the fuel distributor based on his report. Is the Interstate Commerce Commission under this bill authorized to make an independent investigation, if it sees fit to do so, in addition to the report made by the fuel distributor?

Mr. WINSLOW. It would be my construction that the Interstate Commerce Commission has authority to go ahead on its own findings. If they can make a finding I should think it would automatically appear that they could go ahead and ascertain the facts.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The purpose of providing for a fuel distributor is that he shall make an investigation and the burden rest on him?

Mr. WINSLOW. Not necessarily. The Interstate Commerce Commission could make an investigation, and the fuel distributor could make an investigation and report to the commission for its benefit. The commission could use such report or could depend upon their own investigation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman's interpretation is that the commission would not be bound by the findings of the fuel distributor, but could make an independent investigation.

Mr. WINSLOW. That is my construction. I think that is the alignment in all the bills. There was at one stage of the work in preparing the bill a proposition that we should put the whole business into the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but the commission threw up its hands, so to speak, and said, "We can not handle it; we have neither the facilities nor the available directing personnel to direct it. You will get better work and more effective results if you appoint a distributor who can make the investigation and report to us."

Mr. BANKHEAD. One question more, and then I will not bother the gentleman further.

Mr. WINSLOW. It is no bother.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it not a fact that under the strict construction of section 2 the bill clothes the Interstate Commerce Commission with the absolute plenary power to fix the price of coal in the United States?

Mr. WINSLOW. I do not think so.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why not?

Mr. WINSLOW. Well, to illustrate, they might say that any coal which was sold by the operator for over $10 a ton would not receive cars for transportation. That does not mean that a man could not sell it for $5, $7, or $8 a ton. It simply says that anything above $10 would not warrant the assignment of cars for transportation. The operator might sell it for 50 cents or any price below $10 a ton.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The proposed bill gives as much power to fix the price of coal as the original bill which the gentleman had in the House.

Mr. WINSLOW. I think so.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I have an instance where coal was taken from a gas company that owned their own line and produced it for $2 a ton. They have had to go out into the market and buy coal for $5 or $6 a ton. Does this bill give the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to do that?

Mr. WINSLOW. The statement is interesting, but of course we have not time to check it up.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If the gentleman doubts it, I will check it up for him.

Mr. WINSLOW. No; I am merely making myself secure preliminary to making answer. I do not know what the circumstances are, but I think if there is any abuse in that line the Interstate Commerce Commission would have a right to correct it.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. The gentleman, chairman of the committee, has explained the difference between the Senate amendment and the final bill as proposed. In what respect does the Senate amendment differ from the House bill?

Mr. WINSLOW. It does not differ much. That is an easy question to ask, but it will take some time to answer. If the gentleman will read the Senate bill and then refer to the changes he will get it. I would be glad to answer the gentleman if I had time.

Mr. LONDON. Can the gentleman state what is the essential difference?

Mr. WINSLOW. That the gentleman will find in the statement.

Mr. LONDON. That gives the difference between the Senate bill and the bill as finally agreed upon, but the report fails to give the difference between the House bill and the Senate bill.

Mr. WINSLOW. That is true.

Mr. LONDON. What is the difference between the original Senate bill and the original House bill?

Mr. WINSLOW. I think if you turn to the statement you will find virtually the information you seek; there may be some omissions, but in effect everything that relates vitally to the bill is in the statement. I am not trying to run away from the gentleman's question, but I have not time to make the comparison.

Mr. LONDON. Is it merely a difference of language?

Mr. WINSLOW. Not entirely; no.

Mr. LONDON. It is different in substance?

Mr. WINSLOW. In some respects.

Mr. LONDON. In all respects?

Mr. WINSLOW. The gentleman will find all of that in the statement.

Mr. WYANT. Under this bill may the Government, through its agency thus created, divert coal to an insolvent concern and, at the same time, the Government assume no responsibility for its payment?

Mr. WINSLOW. Does the gentleman ask it from a legal point of view or from a practical point of view?

Mr. WYANT. I am asking for information.

Mr. WINSLOW. If the gentleman asks as to the legality I do not know, but practically I think the situation he describes is subject to control of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. WYANT. Does not your bill provide for such a contingency?

Mr. WINSLOW. It may.

Mr. WYANT. Has it not been the experience among large and even small operators that they have not been able to collect for coal distributed during the war?

Mr. WINSLOW. It may have been.

Mr. MERRITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. I will.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I was not here when the bill first went through the committee. As I understand, section 7 is intended to remedy the possibility of the middleman getting coal and profiteering on it?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes.

Mr. MERRITT. They are the men subject to these penalties?

Mr. WINSLOW. That is the idea in part.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CHALMERS. I want to inform the chairman that the Willys-Overland Co., of my home city, one of the largest industrial concerns in the State, has a contract with the Blue Diamond Mines Co., of eastern Kentucky, for the delivery to this automobile factory of 5,000 tons of coal per month at $1.85 per ton at the mine. The Blue Diamond Mines Co. has defaulted in this contract, claiming that on account of lack of railroad transportation facilities they are not able to carry out their agreement. And yet, Mr. Chairman, with the consent or at least with the knowledge of the coal distributor, this company is shipping coal to Toledo, right past the Willys-Overland factory, to be loaded on lake boats for delivery to consumers in Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. I am informed that the Blue Diamond Mines Co. is selling the coal they are shipping through Toledo to northern points for $4.50 to $5 per ton at the mines. I want to ask the distinguished chairman if the bill his committee is recommending that we approve will remedy this situation?

Mr. WINSLOW. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that the purpose of the bill is to correct all evils.

Mr. CHALMERS. I am glad to receive that assurance. This is a very important matter to the people of my district. The Willys-Overland Co. is now employing over 11,000 men. The livelihood of about one-fifth of my constituents was jeopardized by this default.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman explain if the bill fixes it so they will get after such men?

Mr. WINSLOW. We hope so.

Mr. SNYDER. Does the gentleman think this is broad enough to cover it? I do not think so.

Mr. MERRITT. Is it not true with reference to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York that the State of New York must cooperate?

Mr. WINSLOW. They must do so to obtain the best results.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. As I understand this bill provides the emergency shall be over in six months.

Mr. WINSLOW. It provides it may run a year, except as to offenses against the act, and then must terminate, but it may be terminated before under proclamation of the President, except as to these offenses.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It differs from the House bill, which gave the President the right to declare an emergency at any time.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I would like to reserve five minutes for myself at the end of the hour. If anybody would like to speak I shall be delighted to yield.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I notice that section 1 declares that an emergency exists, and I understand that the emergency continues until the proclamation of the President that it is ended.

Mr. WINSLOW. The emergency ends at the expiration of a year, unless otherwise proclaimed by the President. It continues until the President's proclamation to the contrary for one year after it becomes an act.

Mr. FESS. The act terminates within one year?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes; but it may be terminated at any time by the proclamation of the President. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes.

THE CAPE COD CANAL.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I have received a telegram which I ask that the Clerk may read in my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that a telegram be read in his time. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. GEORGE HUDDLESTON,
House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce,
Washington, D. C.:

I note that the Senate has passed the Cape Cod Canal bill. We consider it of utmost importance that House should accept Senate bill and act immediately so that it may become law before adjournment of Congress. On account of strikers New England fuel and manufacturing condition critical and every available means of transportation needed. Government ownership and free use of the canal necessary for all New England interests before coming winter. Please do everything possible to push it through without delay. Such action would also help at reelections in November.

EDWARD E. BLODGETT,
Chairman Maritime Association, Boston Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, in these critical times we must not be unmindful of the November elections. [Laughter.] The frosty mornings of November are rapidly approaching. We must arrange to get coal for the people, and also we must arrange that our New England brethren be permitted to "bring home the bacon" on the Cape Cod Canal.

It is strange what asinine things prominent and sensible business men will say in carrying on a propaganda for selfish and local interests. That observation is peculiarly apt as applied to the telegram which has just been read. The Cape Cod Canal has been open for years. It is now in operation. It is as much in operation in private ownership as it would be if the Government owned it.

Not a pound more of coal can be carried over the canal if the Government should submit to the demands of August Belmont and his financial associates, who now own the canal, and buy it for free Government operation. Not a pound more of coal can be carried under Government ownership over that canal during the present emergency than if it is left to Mr. Belmont and his private interests to continue to operate it.

We are urged to pass the Cape Cod Canal purchase bill on the ground of the coal emergency. We are further urged to pass it upon the ground that it will be of political benefit to certain gentlemen. Who they may be I do not know. I am sure it will not be of much benefit in the coming election to anybody in my section. To the contrary, I am quite sure that if the folks down there understood fully the lack of merit of the proposition they would take occasion to make their Representative feel the effect of their displeasure if he should vote for it.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. Is that the reason why you are against it?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Oh, no; but I might well consider the views of my constituents upon the public welfare, though they have no selfish interest in the matter. It does, however, affect the selfish interests of the gentleman's constituents. It means a saving to them of from 5 to 10 cents per ton on the freight charge on coal. They are interested in placing upon the taxpayers of the country that part of the burden which rightfully belongs to themselves. The gentleman's chamber of commerce is demanding that the bill be passed. They are demanding that the gentleman "bring home the bacon." Oh, the gentleman from Massachusetts is a very dignified man, and I respect him very much, and I assure him that it will not enhance his dignity to go back home lugging a side of pork on his shoulder. [Laughter.] I submit also that it will take more than that to swing a Massachusetts constituency in the next election. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, with one exception, as the chairman of the committee [Mr. WINSLOW] explained a moment ago, this bill is equally as obnoxious to me as the one that passed the House. The principle of price fixing is just as firmly set in this measure as it was in the other. But since the other measure passed I have talked to a number of old-line Members of this House who have always believed in constitutional government and the opportunity of each individual to work out his own salvation, and they apologize for voting with the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] for a bill that seeks by legislation to fix the price of a commodity. You may equivocate all you want to. This bill firmly fixes that principle on this Congress, and we are going to have to swallow it again. I am not. I am going to vote against it.

The other principle involved is that of taking a man's property away from him and selling it to somebody else who is not financially responsible. There is no question but that the Interstate Commerce Commission has the right to take coal from one consignee and give it to another, regardless of his financial responsibility, and no one can deny that that is true.

I have an instance now in mind, and if the gentleman from Massachusetts wants proof of it I will be glad to prove it to him—a gas concern, supplying a great number of people, owns its own coal mines and operates them in order that it may have coal all the time. They produced 30 cars of coal one day this week at a cost of about $2 per ton, and the Interstate Commerce Commission has taken them away from them and shipped them up to Detroit, and this gas concern is required to go out and bid at the mouth of the mine for free coal and pay $5 or $6 a ton.

Are you going to set such a precedent here? You say, "It is already the law." Yes; the Interstate Commerce Commission is doing it, regardless of this law, but you are here giving them more power by this bill. Do you think you have the right, either morally, equitably, or legally, to go to a mine owner who owns a gas plant and take his product away from him and shut down his business and require him to go out into the market and pay three times the cost of producing coal from his own mine?

You gentlemen who are here defending the rights of industry and property, will you swallow this kind of stuff this late in the session, and acquiesce in it, and say you believe in a practice of that kind? I again warn you, if you do, that there is no end of that kind of legislation. I have again warned you that you are taking the step to-day that will embarrass you in the future. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the bill has been improved in one respect. The word "extortion" that was used in the House bill has been eliminated. It was eliminated by the Senate and the conferees have agreed to its elimination. In the House bill the word had no meaning whatever, and in order to give the section an intelligent meaning they have stricken out that word and inserted the words "unreasonable and unjust." Now, what will be the effect of that provision of the bill? We are now giving a Government agency for the first time in the history of our Government the right in time of peace to determine what shall be a reasonable price to be charged for coal, or to fix the price above which will be unreasonable and unjust, and then say to the producer or anyone else that he can not sell his coal except at that price. We are giving this agency the power to put an embargo upon a coal producer if he offers to sell or does sell his coal at a price above the price fixed by this agency.

The producer of coal will thereby be deprived of a property right, and he has no appeal to any court or to any other tribunal. Now, that is taking his property without due process of law, and with no provision for giving him just compensation. If Congress can do that, I am one of those who want to find it out just as soon as possible. If we can do that, then the Congress of the United States is absolutely omnipotent and there are no limitations on its power.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I want to ask the gentleman two questions as a lawyer.

Mr. DENISON. I hope the gentleman will make them brief as I have only a short time.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Say I am a coal broker in Chicago. I come to the gentleman's mines in Kentucky and buy this coal. I ship it to my yards in Chicago, within the bounds of another State. It is no longer in interstate commerce. Can I not charge the consumers in Chicago any amount under this bill, if there is no law in the State of Illinois to prevent it?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Sure you can.

Mr. DENISON. I think you could.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I live in a State where every pound of coal consumed in Kentucky comes from the Kentucky mines. Without any State law in Kentucky can not the coal operators of Kentucky charge the Kentucky consumers any price they want to, and this law will not reach them?

Mr. DENISON. I will state frankly that I have not examined the bill carefully enough to give an intelligent opinion upon that.

Mr. KINCHELOE. That coal does not go into interstate commerce.

Mr. DENISON. The Senate limited the operations of this bill to interstate transactions in coal, and thereby, I think, gave it a semblance of constitutionality, if it had any at all; but the conferees have changed that and now make it apply to all sales of coal without regard to its being an interstate or intrastate transaction. In other words, gentlemen, this bill, in my judgment, gives the Federal fuel agency carte blanche authority to put an embargo upon any person in any part of the United States who sells or buys coal above the price fixed by the fuel distributor.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Do you think they would have the power under the Constitution to levy an embargo within the State?

Mr. DENISON. I do not think they have that power under the Constitution, but I am telling you what this bill does. That is my interpretation of the bill as it has been reported by the conferees.

Mr. Speaker, the Constitution provides that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken without just compensation. The commerce clause of the Constitution was inserted therein by the Constitutional Convention because the States had been placing embargoes on shipments of products from one State to another. The power to regulate between the States does not include the power to forbid shipment of the product from one State to another because the Government is not satisfied with the price charged for the product. Forbidding the right of transportation to a product is taking from the owner of that product a property right. This bill would deprive producers of coal of their property rights without any semblance of due process of law and without just compensation. As much as I want to see all kinds of profiteering in coal stopped if possible, as much as I would like to protect the people of this country from being imposed upon by anyone in the sale of coal, I am unwilling to stultify myself and disregard my own conscience and my duties under my oath by voting for a bill which I think is clearly invalid and unconstitutional.

The mines are all working. The railroad strike has been settled practically, and in a very short time there will be a surplus of coal on the market. If the provisions of this bill are carried out, the great mining industry will be interfered with by Government officials here in Washington who know nothing about the business and who can not possibly, from their offices here in Washington, determine what would be reasonable prices for coal in the different parts of the United States, because they could not in the limited time allowed ascertain the cost of production and the various elements which enter into the question of fair prices and fair profits. Even if the bill were valid it would be unworkable and will tend to depress the production of coal, and, in my judgment, will increase the price to the great majority of consumers because the maximum price fixed will become the minimum price charged.

Of course this bill has already been approved once and it will be approved here again to-day. But if by any chance it should be held to be within our constitutional limitations, I predict that the exercise of this power by Congress will come back to plague us in the future when other similar legislation is demanded under some serious provocation or emergency.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The chairman of the committee in the Senate who was the author of the Senate bill takes the position that the transportation of coal in a State is so related to interstate commerce that if you pass a law regulating interstate commerce you also include all commerce in coal within the State. Then this bill reaches intrastate commerce in that way, does it not?

Mr. DENISON. I think the language of the conference report would include intrastate transactions as well as interstate transactions. The Senate bill limited its provisions to interstate transactions and thereby improved the House bill, but the conferees have rejected that and have provided not for limiting it to interstate transactions, but, presumably under the general welfare clause, have extended it by giving to the Federal agency carte blanche authority to fix a reasonable price and enforce it by embargo or preference. I do not believe that can properly be done.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, during the discussion some gentleman asked the question, as I understood it—there was some confusion in the House and perhaps I did not hear the question clearly—if this bill lodged any authority anywhere to compel the sale of coal to certain parties and to parties who might not be able to pay for the coal? The answer to that, it seems to me, is very easy. There is nothing in the bill that gives anyone authority to compel the sale of coal to anybody. The only authority in the bill is to deny the use of cars, a purely negative function.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. Does not the bill give the commission the right to divert coal from one region to another? And when you divert coal you do not simply divert it from nobody. You have to divert it from some particular person.

Mr. MONDELL. The cars may be furnished with the understanding that the coal is to go into a certain region, but cars can not be diverted on the theory that coal is to be sold to certain parties.

Mr. DENISON. But if coal is diverted it must be diverted to certain parties. You can not divert it to a State without diverting it to somebody within the State. I think the gentleman has misunderstood the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. If the bill contained any such authority as the gentleman seems to suggest, I certainly should not vote for it.

Mr. DENISON. I hope the gentleman will look into it a little carefully, then, because I think it does that.

Mr. MONDELL. The bill does nothing of the sort. The authority granted is authority to refuse to grant cars for certain shipments. The purpose is to prevent profiteering in coal and to accomplish that purpose cars may be withheld or furnished as may best serve the end sought.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. At least as much power is granted in this bill as the Interstate Commerce Commission now has, is there not?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Just now they are taking 30 cars from an intrastate shipment and delivering them to parties in Detroit, Mich., and I do not know whether they are solvent or not, and nobody else knows whether they are solvent. If they can do that under existing law, the commission can do that under this law, can they not?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman must not confuse what some one may have done with what some one may have authority to do. Some one may be assuming authority to do the things the gentleman complains of, but it does not follow that there is authority to do that sort of thing or that we are conferring any such authority in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I assume that every Member of the House would be glad to vote for any reasonable, proper measure within our power to protect the American people against the profiteer and to insure an even, fair distribution of fuel this winter. But this bill does not do that. If you will read the bill—and I say that for the benefit of the gentleman from Wyoming—and if you will use ordinary intelligence, you are forced to the conclusion that this bill, even as submitted by the conferees, will not dig a single ton of coal, nor will it shackle a single profiteer. I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, at the statement of the Republican leader [Mr. MONDELL]. He stood up here and solemnly assured gentlemen who had some misgivings on that side. Ninety per cent of the men on this floor, 90 per cent of those who are going to vote for this bill, are going to do it with reluctance, coerced into it by the cry that it will check profiteering, but it does not do what it is said it will do. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] said this bill did nothing more than grant authority to give priorities in the distribution of cars. Was not that the gentleman's statement?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman can make his own statement, and I will make mine. He misquoted me at the start, and he can continue to do that.

Mr. WINGO. No; I never misquoted the gentleman. Did the gentleman not state that all this law would do would be to authorize priority for controlling the distribution of cars?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman heard what I said.

Mr. WINGO. All right. The House heard it. If that statement is not true, a man of the gentleman's great experience and ability ought not to be afraid to answer yes or no. I do not want to misrepresent the gentleman. Is not that a reasonable inference to be drawn from his statement? And was not that statement thrown out to give some assurance to level-headed business men in this House who view this thing with alarm? Why, gentlemen, if this bill did nothing more than what the gentleman from Wyoming claims it will do, it would be a waste of paper, because what he said is to be done is already the law. Read the transportation act. Read the statutes that are already on the statute books.

The Interstate Commerce Commission can to-day, and is to-day, controlling the distribution of cars, granting priorities on conditions, and they have been going so far as to stipulate in those conditions in more than one instance what I am about to state. I have seen the telegrams in the hands of men on the Republican side this morning telling of cases where men had their own coal, public utility companies, that had their own coal taken from their own mines and ordered to ship so many cars to a specific person in another State, notwithstanding they needed it for their own plant, a public utility. That is what they are trying to do. They have not the authority under the priority of distribution law to do that. They know they are proceeding at this hour on a bluff. They are already acting on this law. They want this law to ratify their actions. Camouflage it as you may, they want you to ratify and confirm and authorize them to continue that practice which is alarming men in Indiana and other States at this hour. This bill goes further than your present law. Under your present law the Interstate Commerce Commission can refuse cars to any consignee when, in their judgment, the public welfare may require that they distribute them and allot them elsewhere. But, I repeat, they are going further under this law. Under this law you not only can fix the price but you can absolutely select the customers. My God, what are we coming to? You ought to apologize not only to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] for following his socialistic precepts and principles, but you ought to apologize to Lenin and Trotski and recognize their government at this hour, because this is the method used by Lenin and Trotski to control basic industries in Russia. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. WINGO. Did not the chairman of the committee, in response to an inquiry by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], state that if a man charged $10 for coal they might refuse to give him cars to transport the coal. They might refuse to permit him to sell the coal for $10 when he could sell it for $5 or 50 cents?

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will.

Mr. WINSLOW. If I made that statement it was because I did not control my language. I would like to explain it.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will give me time.

Mr. WINSLOW. I will give the gentleman two minutes, which is all I have left to give away.

Mr. WINGO. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WINSLOW. The proposition is this: I said the Interstate Commerce Commission might say to the operator, "If you undertake and do make sales for over $10 a ton you will not get cars," but I said it did not preclude the operator from selling his coal for $1, $2, or $5 below $10 a ton.

Mr. WINGO. That is the statement that I made. That is what I understood. I might be unfortunate in expressing myself. In other words, they might fix it at $5 or $15. Why, gentlemen, our experience in the war showed us that when you fix a maximum it becomes the minimum. Now, gentlemen, read section 7. I will quit my seat in the House before I will ever permit any man to become a criminal because he refuses to follow the directions made at the unrestrained sweet will of a bureau or the Interstate Commerce Commission or an executive officer in the sale of his property. It says:

> shall dispose of the same for purposes other than those for which said priority or direction was issued without the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Gentlemen, I had hoped that in the last campaign, when you gentlemen carried the country on the cry that you wanted to get us back to constitutional government and away from war-time laws, I hoped in your zeal you would get away from the war-time laws. I want to get away from them. This bill will cause confusion. It gives war powers in time of peace; it will increase the price of coal; it will retard the production of coal and confuse the distribution of coal; and it will be a blow at our system of government and a confession that constitutional government is a failure under a Republican administration. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, it may not be entirely apropos to the subject under discussion to invite your attention to the fact that a great convention will be held in New Orleans from October 16 to October 20. But the suggestion of that great event is the result of a train of thought set in motion by the statements made during the consideration of this bill as an original legislation proposition, and the observations of Members as to the sufferings that the people of the North, East, and West will have to undergo during the rapidly approaching winter on account of a shortage of coal and other fuel. I trust that these grave apprehensions will be dissipated, and that the same power that has tempered the winds to the shorn lamb will in accordance with His inscrutable wisdom operate the law of the seasons so as to mitigate the severity of the cold and wintry visitation.

The more fortunate will generously see that the poor and lowly are not without a fair share of the fuel so necessary, not for the comfort and well-being of our toilers and wage earners in town and country, though we should not be unmindful of such a result, but to prevent the illness and the wretchedness and misery that follow freezing nights and melancholy days. This may in a large measure be accomplished by those who have been favored by fortune making a journey not abroad but to a section of our country warmer, more hospitable, and more understanding than the peoples on the other side of either ocean can possibly be. Why not let the well to do and the opulent who desire to travel go down to the famous old city, the city of song and story—New Orleans, the city of warmth and sunshine—for even a short period? It would not only be a delightful vacation spent among our own country men and women and in a city that has a charm and atmosphere all its own, but would enable the poor of the visitor's home town to receive more fuel as a result of the traveler's temporary absence.

See America is almost a trite expression, but I hope it will never lose its edge or patriotic appeal. See America first should be the duty of the legislator, the publicist, the man of affairs who can not express the spirit of the country until he knows his country—North, South, East, and West. In fact, it is the duty of every American to know his native land as well as fortune and opportunity will permit, for to know it is to love it.

Many truths are to be found in the lines:

> He that would bring home the wealth of the Indies must carry the wealth of the Indies with him.

So it is in traveling. A man must carry knowledge with him if he would bring home knowledge.

The profit of a visit by travelers to historic Orleans would be as great to the visitors as to the residents. The interchange of ideas would enrich both. But the value of a visit, trip, or what you will to New Orleans from the 15th to the 25th of October, when Congress will be in recess or adjournment, would be greatly enhanced this year, for the great convention of the American Legion will be held in the southern metropolis from the 16th to the 20th of October. It is thought that 200,000 of our brave boys from every congressional district in the United States will be there to renew the comradeships made across the Atlantic Ocean, in many instances, in the days of the trench and the gas mask of no man's land, where "Flanders Fields" and "I have a rendezvous with death" and "Open wide the gates" thrilled the soul of America and lifted us to heights of patriotic emotionalism in all probability seldom equaled and never surpassed in the history of the world.

The mothers and fathers and sisters and brothers of these brave boys will be there, and many, many mothers and fathers and sisters and brothers of boys who never will be seen on earth again—praises and more for the living and tears for the dead—even though the dead are now with those choice spirits who in all ages gave their lives as a holocaust to their country's needs. For them—

The muffled drum's sad roll has beat
The soldier's last tattoo.
No more on life's parade shall meet
That brave and fallen few;
On Fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead.

As a momentary thought: Let us take care of the living. Succeeding generations will build monuments in every village and hamlet and town and city, commemorating the glory of those who shall not be forgotten—

Where Fame her record keeps
Or Honor points the hallowed spot
Where Valor proudly sleeps.

Let us take care of the living who need our care, affectionately, generously.

Let us take care of those who were wounded in body and in mind; let us assist in every way those who were willing to give up the young fame they burned to win—the romance that makes life worth the living—yes, willing to give up life itself when the bugle blast was the signal to "fall in."

Let it be the duty of those who will come after us to play a great part in the grand drama that may not have its sequel for two or three generations. Let it be the duty of these succeeding generations to build monuments which will cause the beholder to recall the lines—

Yon marble minstrel's voiceless stone
In deathless song shall tell
When many a vanquished age hath flown
The story how ye fell;
Nor wreck, nor change, nor winter's blight
Shall dim one ray of glory's light
That gilds your deathless tomb.

Now, back to the main thought.

During the convention the panorama of American life will be unrolled and spread before the eyes of the visitor in an unforgetable way. There boys and girls, men and women, from every part of the United States will be in the picture, for it will be the greatest moving picture ever seen.

There will be enthusiastic greetings and joyous shouts of recognition. Songs, stories, wonderful tales and accounts of adventures. Many excursions will be made to the rich sugar plantations contiguous to New Orleans, and which will be in the very blast of operations; trips to the land of the beautiful Teche, the home of Evangeline, and the bearded oaks immortalized by Longfellow; trips to the far-famed princely and gorgeously beautiful rice fields of southwestern Louisiana; drives down to the Plains of Chalmette, a few miles below New Orleans; and the great Poydras Crevasse, an object lesson to the beholder of the terrors and dangers that lie in the Father of Waters when he is at flood height to the dwellers behind the levees.

To those who think they can tear themselves away from the enchantment, the mystery, the indescribable charm of New Orleans, there is the logical point from which to make a trip down to the Panama Canal, the banana fields and plantations of Central America, and back within a few days.

But few will be able to leave New Orleans until they find it absolutely necessary to return home. The Mississippi River front of the city will claim and hold the attention of all visitors, for right in front of the city will be as much of "America's fleet" as will be available. The port facilities, pronounced by the United States engineers, through the chief of that service, to be among the finest in the world, are worthy of the attention and study of men who like to think of and are interested in how our commerce is carried over the Seven Watery Plains to every port in the world by our "riders to the sea."

There in New Orleans you will catch and find an application of the beautiful classical stories of Minerva springing armed cap-a-pie from the brain of Jove, and Venus arising in birth from the foam of the ocean wave, for in less than 25 years New Orleans has become a city that can proudly take its place side by side with the imperial modern cities of the world, and yet it has not lost the memories nor the charming atmosphere of the past.

Twenty-five years ago New Orleans was a Latin city with an American quarter. To-day it is an American city with a Latin quarter. The Latin quarter is just as French in architecture and in the deportment of a great many of its people as Paris, though these same people yield to none in their intense Americanism; while in many respects we can easily see that which reminds us of Madrid and carries the mind back to the days of Spanish rule and control. Drained, sewered, lighted, paved, and with its splendid public buildings, including noble-looking schoolhouses, beautiful squares, and public parks, it is apparently a century away from the city that was known a quarter of a century ago largely to Central and South Americans.

But let me conclude, though one can speak of New Orleans for months and not exhaust the subject nor grow weary or wearisome. Let me conclude by urging you and those from your districts who may have the wanderlust to make the visit during the fourth annual convention of the American Legion, which will be held on the 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th of October. Meet the boys of the Legion and those of the ancillary American organization La Société des 40 Hommes et 8 Chevaux, as it will keep you closer to the heroes of the World War, who for their country and God "did noble things."

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I will.

Mr. YOUNG. Is it the idea of the gentleman to get the Republicans down to New Orleans just at the campaign time? [Laughter.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, no. I have a fellow feeling for the Republicans of the North, and I have no desire to do them an injury. I did not think many of them felt that there was any necessity for paying great attention to their campaigns, and I know their constituents would see in such a visit indisputable evidence of judgment, patriotism, and congressional ability. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLAND of Indiana) there were—ayes 112, noes 43.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana objects to the vote on the ground that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant at Arms will bring in the absent Members. All those in favor of agreeing to the conference report will answer "yea" and those opposed will answer "nay" and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 228, nays 70, not voting 129, as follows:

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], but this bill is so important to the people whom I represent that it is all right with him for me to vote "no," and I desire my vote of "no" to stand.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present; the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

TARIFF BILL OF 1922.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 7456.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan calls up a conference report on the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 7456. An act to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can make a point of order at any time until after the report is read.

Mr. GARNER. I desire to give notice that I reserve all points of order.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the report be dispensed with. The report has already been read, except the new matter which came from the action of the committee yesterday with reference to potash and dyestuffs, and everybody knows what that is, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the report be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the reading of the report be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not object to the suspension of the reading of the report as a whole, but would it not be a good idea to read the new matter?

Mr. FORDNEY. There is nothing except the matter that was in the motion to recommit. There is no change made except on potash and the dye embargo.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What about the question of the valuation basis?

Mr. FORDNEY. That is on dyes, and that was in both the House and Senate provisions before the motion to recommit.

Mr. GARNER. What the gentleman from Michigan, if I understand him, intends to convey is that the conferees on the part of the House carried out the House's instructions and then undertook to rewrite the rates.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say to the gentleman that the House bill placed 30 per cent ad valorem on intermediates and 7 cents a pound based on American valuation, and 35 per cent ad valorem and 7 cents per pound on the finished product. The Senate based its rates on American selling price, putting 10½ cents on the intermediates and 75 per cent ad valorem, and on dyestuffs at 10½ cents per pound and 90 per cent ad valorem. Now the conferees yesterday agreed to reduce the rate fixed by the Senate to 7 cents per pound and 50 per cent ad valorem on the intermediates, and 7 cents per pound and 60 per cent ad valorem on the finished product for two years, and after that time the ad valorem will be 40 per cent on the intermediates and 45 per cent on the finished product and 7 cents a pound.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. American valuation?

Mr. FORDNEY. On American valuation, which was provided for in both the House and the Senate provisions.

Mr. GARNER. A change in rates on dyes; that is all.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire to raise the point of order against the conference report on the ground that the conferees exceeded their authority.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is to dispense with the reading of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARNER. I reserve all points of order.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that in changing the rates in the chemical schedule and in making other changes in and additions to amendments 83 and 89, the conferees exceeded their authority.

The Chair will remember that the resolution to recommit, adopted by the House, was in the following language:

Mr. GARNER moves to recommit the conference report on the bill H. R. 7456 to the committee of conference with instructions to the House conferees to agree to the Senate amendments putting fertilizer potash on the free list and to strike out the provision containing the dye embargo.

Those were specific instructions. The conferees on the part of the House are simply representatives of the House, and when given instructions which limit their authority they should not be permitted to violate those instructions nor go beyond the authority expressly conferred. When first appointed as House conferees it was that they might meet conferees appointed by the Senate and with them have a full and free conference. Their first appointment was without instructions. The whole bill was committed to the conference committee for consideration and report. When, on Tuesday last, three days ago, the conferees filed the first conference report, their authority as conferees wholly ceased. They could as such do nothing more. On the filing of that first report they were as conferees functus officio.

Yesterday, when the motion to recommit with instructions was adopted, it was in effect and in fact the second appointment of House conferees but not, this time, to attend a full and free conference on the whole bill but to follow the instructions contained in the resolution by which they again became conferees.

Now, in the very brief time at my disposal, since the printing to-day of this second conference report I have not found an authority exactly in point. I do, however, find paragraph 4404 of Hinds:

Where a matter is recommitted with instructions the committee must confine itself within the instructions.

The committee, in that instance, was, it is true, a special, not a conference committee. But reasoning by analogy, the House conferees on this second conference committee being special representatives of the House for a special purpose mentioned in the instructions and not to attend a full and free conference were bound to confine themselves within the instructions.

I now read paragraph 5526 of volume 5 of Hinds':

When a bill is recommitted with instructions relating only to a certain portion, the committee must not review other portions.

The SPEAKER. What volume is that?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is volume 5, paragraph 5526 of Hinds, a statement by Hinds himself:

When a bill is recommitted with instructions relating only to a certain portion, the committee can not review other portions.

That does not, as I said before, refer expressly to a conference committee.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman please cite it once more?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have it here marked "5526." It is certainly in volume 5. I just observed that it does not make direct reference to a conference committee.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not the question come down entirely to the fact that this is a conference committee? The gentleman does not contend that the House can bind the Senate conferees?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; certainly not. I have not made the statement that the House can bind the Senate conferees. But I do contend that the House can bind its own conferees, and that when it appoints them, not to attend a "full and free" conference but instructs them to agree to two specified items, they are not authorized to disagree to 500 others.

If the House conferees appointed on this second conference, under specific instructions to agree to the Senate amendments putting potash for fertilizers on the free list and to strike out the dye embargo, had found that the Senate conferees refused to stand by the former action of the Senate, then the House conferees could have come back here and so reported; but they should not be permitted to violate the instructions given to them by the House in the motion to recommit, which limited their authority by specifically mentioning the items to which they were to agree.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is in error in one respect. The House conferees were not instructed to agree to the conference report with those two exceptions. They were simply instructed to take out the dye embargo and the potash item and present a bill here without the dye embargo and without the potash item and put potash on the free list.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, in order that there be no misunderstanding as to the premises of the argument, perhaps it would be well to read the motion to recommit. The gentleman from Iowa has remarked that the House did not instruct the conferees to agree, and so forth. Here is the language:

Mr. GARNER moves to recommit the conference report on the bill H. R. 7456 to the committee of conference with instructions to the House conferees to agree to the Senate amendments putting fertilizer potash on the free list and to strike out the provision containing the dye embargo.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, that has been done.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But, Mr. Speaker, any fair interpretation of the motion to recommit with instructions, and of the purpose of the House in adopting it, would require the application of the principle of the rule of statutory construction that the mention of one thing is the exclusion of another. The specific mention of two items excluded the thousands of other items.

Here was the House instructing its conferees to agree to the amendments of the Senate in those two particulars. But that should not be held to authorize them not only to agree to those two items, but also to amend, add to, or disagree to any of the multitude of other provisions. Of what use is it when, with specific instructions to agree to two things, conferees may change or disagree to a thousand?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman contend that the bill, having been recommitted to the conferees, it would not be in order for them to take up the entire wool schedule?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. With due deference to the gentleman, I answer no. The conferees on the part of the House on the second conference were limited in their authority to consider items by the terms of the motion under which they themselves were appointed. If the Senate should refuse to appoint conferees, very well. That might kill the bill, but would not be the fault of the House.

We were simply instructing our conferees to agree to what the Senate had already agreed, and if for any reason they would not permit us to agree the responsibility would be upon the Senate, not upon the House; or if the Senate should refuse to appoint conferees to a second conference, that would in no wise be the fault of the House, which would have been acting entirely within its rights.

Is it reasonable to say that there is no difference between the authority of conferees appointed to attend a full and free conference on an entire bill, and the authority of the conferees who yesterday were appointed under specific instructions mentioning only two items in the bill? I am asking now a question that ought to be answered once for all, so far as this House is concerned, because if a proposition once defeated in the House and once defeated in the Senate can be brought up repeatedly in this manner by conferees the House ought to know it, and can not know it too quickly.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman believe that the action of the House in recommitting the bill with instructions was in any sense an approval by the House of the conference report?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am contending that for the purposes of the second conference the House conferees were bound by the instructions contained in the motion to recommit. The first conference report had been filed, but the House did not wish to consent to all of its provisions. For example, the House was opposed to the embargo on dyes and to the tariff on potash, and it recommitted the bill with instructions to its conferees to agree to the Senate provision striking them out.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In one moment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What the House really did by the motion to recommit with those instructions was, in effect, equivalent to a motion to recede from its disagreement on those two items and to concur.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman think that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] intended to instruct the conferees to agree to all the rest of this bill except those two items? If so, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has entirely changed his politics, or else he is an awfully poor parliamentarian, and I do not think either one of those things is the fact. What the gentleman last stated would have been the form if the House had intended to do what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] states, namely, a motion to recede and concur in all the rest of it. But there is nothing about concurring in the rest of the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the debate began under a rule which provided that at the expiration of the debate the previous question should be considered as ordered. Under the rule a motion to recommit was in order. An opponent of the bill made the motion to recommit and it was carried, instructing the conferees on the part of the House to agree to two provisions of the bill as passed by the Senate. Now, if this were one of the regular committees of the House there would be no question but that it would be bound to consider only the items mentioned in the motion to recommit. But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] suggested that the question here depends wholly on the fact that this was a conference committee. But, as I have said, the House conferees were not appointed to attend a full and free conference. They were instructed to agree to two things. And in this case, Mr. Speaker, I can see no reason for a rule different from that which obtains when a motion is made to recommit a bill to a regular committee of the House with instructions. "When," says Hinds, "a bill is recommitted with instructions relating only to a certain portion the committee must not review other portions."

As to obeying instructions, why should there be for House conferees a rule different from the rule for House committees? Why should we not in this case apply the rule laid down by Mr. Speaker Reed, one of the greatest of parliamentarians, when on a bill being recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations he said that the committee would be confined to the matter mentioned in the instructions?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair thinks that the argument of the gentleman from Wisconsin is based on a failure to distinguish the difference between the reference of a bill to a committee with instructions and the reference to the conferees with instructions. The case which the gentleman cited was the reference of a bill to a committee with instructions to report the bill back, and it is well established, as the gentleman states, that in that case the committee is bound and limited by the orders of the House, and immediately it reports the bill back without any meeting of the committee at all. It is really a technical performance. But if the House will consider for a moment, there is a great difference between sending a bill back to a committee of the House, which is under the control of the House, and sending a conference report back to conferees who are not subject to the will of the House, because the Senate conferees have equal power and are quite independent.

This case does not rest simply on the Chair's opinion, but there is a decision by a Speaker whose opinion carries as much authority, probably, as that of anybody who has even been in the chair, Speaker Carlisle. In a decision cited in Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, section 6395, he went oven further than it is necessary for the Chair to go now. He went so far as to say that if the House conferees disobeyed the instructions of the House, still the report is not on that account subject to a point of order. Of course, the House is not bound to agree to it and probably would not agree with its conferees if they so acted, but, as Speaker Carlisle said, the conferees are partly from the House and partly from the Senate. They are there to come to an agreement, and the House conferees, of course, are subject, and feel themselves subject to the orders of the House, but if they disobey it and come back, it is not subject to a point of order, but it is subject to review by the House. In the present instance, of course, it is not necessary to go as far as that, because the conferees have strictly obeyed the orders of the House and have made the changes which the House commanded and have made other changes as to which they had no directions. When the House referred the bill back to the conferees, the whole bill went again to conference. Speaker Clark in the case of a bill which the Members who were then here will well remember, the great Army bill at the beginning of the war, answered a parliamentary inquiry on this very point, that when the bill went back to the conferees with instructions the whole bill was then before the conferees. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order to the new language inserted by the conferees which was not in either the House bill or the Senate bill, on page 303, lines 14 to 25; page 304, lines 1 to 12; page 305, lines 3 to 24, inclusive; and page 306, lines 1 to 14, inclusive.

Mr. Speaker, I base this point of order on the ground that under the ruling of the Chair and under the ruling of all the Speakers as I interpret them, the conferees can not insert in a conference report matter that is not in controversy between the two Houses. I believe that is a well-established rule, of both the House and of the Senate. Amendment No. 1665, which was placed in the bill in the Senate, undertook to apply the elastic-rate provision in the hands of the President to the chemical schedule, but did not apply it to any other schedule in the bill. The House had American valuation and the Senate had foreign valuation. Now the conferees come along and undertake to extend the President's power to change the rates to 50 per cent higher or 50 per cent lower, as the case may be, and to change the valuation. I think they had the power, probably, to give the President the authority to change the valuation, but they have gone much further than that, as the Speaker will see by reading the language to which I have directed his attention.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Just so that it may be understood by the House, the gentleman is now referring to matter that was in the first conference report?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not think that would make any difference. But I want the House to understand that.

Mr. GARNER. I know no one will claim this is not a new conference report.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary to take up much time in the discusssion of the point of order. The point the gentleman now makes is precisely the same point that was made the other day, and on which the Speaker ruled.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not yet been able to see the exact amendment to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Ohio, in speaking of the other point of order, is referrring to the amendment which changed the words "products" and "merchandise" to "articles." The Speaker in ruling on that point said they had the right to change the word from "merchandise" or "products" to "articles."

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not yet found the clause on which the gentleman from Texas now makes his point of order.

Mr. GARNER. It is found on page 303, beginning with line 14, and page 304 down to line 12, and page 305, beginning with line 3 down to line 24, inclusive, and page 306, beginning with line 1 down to line 14, inclusive.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the question is the same as that involved in the two points of order that the gentleman from Texas made the other day, to wit, that the conferees had no authority to write in a different provision than that contained in the Senate amendment. Now, the fact is that on this particular proposition, which relates to the power of the President to impose punitive rates of duty where it is discovered that other countries are discriminating unjustly or using unfair practices against our commerce, the House said nothing whatever on the subject. The Senate wrote the entire provision by way of amendment. It is unquestionably within the power of the conferees to amend the Senate amendment by any germane amendment. That is all that is involved in this case. It is what was involved in the case the other day. I think it would be without justification to take up any more of the time of the Speaker or of the House in discussing this matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order on the ground that any germane amendment is permissible.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have not been able to get hold of volume 5 of Hinds' Precedents, but in the manual I find a positive statement that the conferees can not exceed differences between the two Houses even though what they propose be germane.

The SPEAKER. But here there is no difference between the two Houses. The House has nothing at all on the question.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not know whether I understand the fact; but if I understood the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] correctly, he stated that the elasticity provision of the bill, as inserted by the Senate, applied only to the chemical schedule, and that the conferees have made it apply to all the schedules.

The SPEAKER. The House had nothing on the subject. It is an entirely new provision put in by the Senate. The Chair thinks any provision which is germane is permissible. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman from Michigan ask unanimous consent, with reference to time for debate on the report, that we have a certain time for debate?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate shall proceed for two hours, one hour on a side, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas and one-half by myself.

MANY MEMBERS. One hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that there be two hours of general debate, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. Is there objection?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I object.

Mr. VARE. I object.

Mr. KING. I object.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, then I ask that general debate continue for one hour, one-half to be controlled by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that debate on the conference report be limited to one hour, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I will be very brief. The conferees met last evening, as per instructions of the House, transferred potash from the protective to the free list, and struck out the embargo on dyestuffs. Permit me to say that the rates of duty on dyestuffs provided in the House bill were based on the American valuation; 7 cents per pound and 30 per cent ad valorem on intermediates, and 7 cents per pound and 35 per cent ad valorem on the finished product. The Senate increased these rates and provided that they should be based on the American selling price, which was practically the House provision. They placed 10½ cents per pound and 75 per cent ad valorem on the intermediates and 10½ cents per pound and 90 per cent ad valorem on the finished product. The conferees agreed to reduce these rates and report 7 cents per pound and 50 per cent ad valorem on the intermediates and 10½ cents per pound and 60 per cent ad valorem on the finished product.

Now the conferees have agreed to 7 cents per pound and 55 per cent ad valorem on the intermediates for two years, and 10½ cents per pound and 60 per cent ad valorem on the finished product for two years, after which two years these ad valorem rates are to be reduced to 40 per cent on the intermediates and 45 per cent on the finished product.

We found in the printed bill an error as to coconuts, which had been placed on the dutiable list in the House bill and on the free list in the Senate bill. The House provision was restored, agreed to in conference, and by some mistake coconuts have been placed on both the dutiable and free lists. Rather than break into another rate, except those included in the motion to recommmit, we have decided to bring in a joint resolution after the passage of this tariff bill placing coconuts on the protected list, where the conferees agreed to place it in the first conference report.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. And in the conference I had with the gentleman this morning in which I agreed to that he agreed to give me an hour. I call attention to the fact that his colleagues do not keep good faith.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am not responsible for that any more than I was for their action day before yesterday. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. I know the gentleman is not, and the gentleman was willing to give me an hour, which I thought I was entitled to.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, I agreed to it and I am sorry the gentleman did not get it; and I am glad, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The provision that was stricken out by order of the House relating to the chemical schedule was a part of the action of the conferees on the Bursum amendment.

Mr. FORDNEY. It was eliminated in the first conference.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Instead of the Bursum amendment the conferees did a number of things; they changed the rates of duty and inserted the continuation of the dye control act.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The Bursum amendment was eliminated in consideration of the dye embargo being continued for one year.

Mr. FORDNEY. Senator BURSUM sent word yesterday that if the language in his amendment was left in it would ruin his reputation, and we sent word back that if it were it would ruin the reputation of the House bill, and therefore we struck it out and saved the reputation of both. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Let me ask the gentleman, has anything been done to give anything like an adequate protection to organic and synthetic medicinal chemicals?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; they are provided for in the bill; adequately provided for.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Why could not we yield and take the Bursum amendment and give sufficient protection?

Mr. FORDNEY. For the reason that the majority of the conferees would not agree to it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Would not agree to the Senate amendment?

Mr. FORDNEY. No. As to many of the provisions in the bill the Senate conferees absolutely declined to stand by their own provisions.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield? There was some confusion when the gentleman was stating something about somebody's reputation being saved. Would the gentleman mind repeating that?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have nothing more to say now.

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman more than one speech on that side?

Mr. FORDNEY. Half a dozen have asked for time.

Mr. GARNER. We have but one more speech on this side.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will ask the gentleman to go ahead and use his time.

Mr. GARNER. That would be hardly fair if the gentleman has more than one speech on his side.

Mr. FORDNEY. There will be but one more speech on this side unless the gentleman makes some statement on the floor.

Mr. GARNER. I ask the gentleman to use his time, as there will be only one speech on this side.

The SPEAKER. The rule or custom is that gentlemen on each side may alternate, but the gentleman from Michigan has the right to the last speech. Does the gentleman from Texas say that there is to be only one speech on his side?

Mr. GARNER. That is all.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, it was Mark Twain, speaking through his lovable character, "Puddenhead Wilson," who said that it is differences of opinion that make horse races. It is differences of opinion, too, that make politics. And it is only through compromises of differences of opinion that tariff laws are possible. Furthermore, it is differences of opinion that very often make for enduring and lasting friendships, such as the friendship which I am glad to say exists between myself and the gentleman from Texas and has for more than 20 years. For his signal ability, for his sturdy patriotism, for his unswerving devotion to duty as he sees it, I have unbounded admiration. Our opinions differ on the tariff, but, as a matter of fact, these differences of opinion are not so great as they seem to be on the surface. My friend from Texas is at heart a protectionist; he believes in the system of protection, but he confines it to things that are produced in his district or in his State, whereas my theory of protection is nation-wide. Not an ounce of potash is produced in my district or in my State; not an ounce of dyestuff is produced in my district and, so far as I know, in my State, and yet I am in favor of protecting both these industries, because I am firmly convinced that without adequate protection they will die. But it is not of the gentleman from Texas as a statesman or a tariff expert that I desire to speak. I speak of him as a fisherman; the greatest fisherman since Isaak Walton.

The gentleman from Texas has gone on a number of fishing excursions during this session of Congress and he has invariably returned with a fine mess, but it remained for him on day before yesterday to break all records. Attended by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON], acting as basket bearer and bait advisor [laughter and applause], he cast his line across this aisle and was rewarded by a catch of more than 100 to add to his already magnificent collection, a record unprecedented in these waters. [Laughter.] But I want to warn the gentleman from Texas, as I understand he is going on another fishing excursion to-day and that he intends to bait his hook with sugar, that conditions are not propitious, as I think, and that his prestige as a fisherman will be very greatly diminished.

I do not deny that I was very greatly, even bitterly, disappointed at the result of the vote day before yesterday on the motion of the gentleman from Texas. I am perfectly convinced that the restoration of potash to the free list means the destruction of the industry in this country, and I believe this to be unfortunate from the farmer's standpoint. I can conceive of no greater benefit to agriculture than to have here a potash industry capable of supplying the entire needs of the country. I am informed that the raw material is here in quantities sufficient to supply this country for a thousand years, and our only trouble is that we have not yet been able to produce it commercially.

I am not sure that the duty provided would have made a self-sustaining potash industry in this country, but I for one was willing to give it a chance. It has always been my theory, as a proper policy of protection, that we ought to produce in this country everything, where it is climatically possible, to meet the needs of the American people for basic necessities [applause], both in time of peace and in time of war. We are too prone to forget, I am afraid, that the time may come when, relying on other countries to furnish us with prime necessities, we may be at their mercy and that we may have to pay for those necessities thousands and tens of thousands of per cent higher than if we had those industries in this country. I was even more bitterly disappointed at the action of this House in striking out the so-called dye embargo. That was not an embargo. For all the dyes necessary for consumers which were not produced here or which were not sold at satisfactory price or on reasonable terms as to delivery could be imported in any quantity. As I pointed out day before yesterday, even under this system, called an embargo by some, over 3,000 different dyes have been imported into this country during the last six months. They have been coming in ever since we have had the regulative system. They would have continued to come in if the system had been made permanent. But, of course, I bowed to the decision of the House. I fear, gentlemen, that you do not all realize the vast importance of this coal-tar chemical industry.

My advocacy—my sincere advocacy—of this industry has been for the medicinal possibilities of it and the absolute necessity of it, if we are to be prepared for war or for any serious danger to this country. I do not believe any system of protective duties, no matter how high, can adequately protect this industry. I do not think any duty, no matter how high, can prevail against the cut-throat methods that Germany has employed and doubtless will continue to employ in the disposition of their chemical products in this and other foreign markets.

In the university of which my friend from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] is a graduate they have spent millions of dollars in equipping laboratories for investigation in the field of organic chemistry, practically a new field in this country. We ought to do everything possible to encourage young men to make investigations in coal-tar chemistry a life work, as they did in Germany. But in order to do that we must have some sort of an industry that can operate profitably to pay them and give them opportunity to make these researches, and that is the dye industry.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is it not true that the House bill, by means of an embargo, gave a sufficient protection to this industry, and that the Senate bill, by higher rates, gave what seemed to be sufficient protection, and that the lower rates without the embargo, given by the conference report, do not give sufficient protection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I repeat that I greatly fear that the rates adopted in the conference report will not give that protection. I do not think that the Bursum rates would have given adequate protection to a great many things that need protection. On the other hand, the reason why I supported a limited embargo is that I have not been in favor of imposing large duties upon the production of dyes that are not produced in this country, and which are necessary for the textile industry.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman has spoken with reference to coal-tar products. Does not the same situation exist as to noncoal-tar manufactures, synthetic organic chemicals, and is it not a fact that the industries that have grown up engaged in the production of these chemicals, these synthetic organic chemicals, will be forced entirely out of business?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not place synthetic organic chemicals as such on quite the same basis as the coal-tar products, because I do not think they have the bedrock national preparedness features of the coal-tar products.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. They are of great value as defense industries, are they not?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; as industries they have great value, but I doubt if we are justified in going so far with them as with coal-tar products. These 20-syllable words in this bill, which are known as "intermediates," have a really romantic side.

The skilled chemist can take one of these intermediates and determine what he will make out of it. He may make a dye or he may make a perfume or he may make a medicine; a medicine absolutely necessary to the health of the people. On the other hand, in time of stress, he may make an explosive or a poison gas out of it. We must keep alive this industry in some way or else we shall be in the same situation that we were in in the last war, where it cost millions of dollars to equip plants to make absolutely necessary explosives and gases.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As to the question asked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM], I see in this morning's Post two full-page advertisements, one of them signed by the Sythentic Organic Chemical Manufacturers' Association of the United States, Charles H. Herty as president, where he says the conference report absolutely means the destruction in this country of the organic chemical industry. Does the gentleman from Ohio believe in the assertions that are made in this full-page advertisement?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Doctor Herty is one of the great chemists of this country. I would not for a moment set up my opinion against his. I hope he is not right with reference to the result of what we have done in this conference.

I will not deny that I may have been shaken somewhat day before yesterday from that equable temper with which I always try to accept defeat, and that I may have thought seriously, now that the entire tariff had been reopened, of reporting back to the House changes in certain other schedules with which I was not entirely satisfied, a thing which it was entirely in the power of any conferee to do. But after cool thought and with the realization that such a procedure might cause a delay of weeks, if not months, in the completion of this bill, I went into the conference with the one idea of reaching an agreement, at the sacrifice, if necessary, of no matter how much of my firm conviction.

We reached an agreement. The passage of this bill is now assured within a very few days. It will be the paramount issue in the next election so far as this House is concerned. Let us merge our differences. Let us conceal our individual disappointment that this or that is not just to our liking. Let us rally to the defense of this bill not apologetically, but strenuously and enthusiastically. This is a protective bill, the country stands for protection, and if we stand together we shall win. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to yield a little time to my good friend from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have the right to extend, have I?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, through the peculiar division of the time I have only a few minutes. I hope, however, that I have something to say that will help the House in the brief time allowed me.

In the first place, I want to explain fully, so that all will understand the situation, the agreement which the conferees made in respect to dyes. The morning papers carried the statement that the conferees had greatly increased the rates which were given in the previous conference report. The only way that any man could claim that we had increased the rates would be by saying that a certain rate that we carried in the present conference report is higher than the embargo. We had an absolute embargo in the original conference report on all dyes that were produced in this country and could be obtained here on reasonable terms.

Now, the duties, when we went back and had to harmonize them, were between our original rates in the House bill on the American valuation and the Senate rates on the American valuation. On that, without going into detail, I will say that the Senate yielded about two-thirds, and that we gave up just about one-third in order to reach an agreement.

The claim was made, as has been stated in this advertisement that has just been alluded to here, that the rates that we now have in the bill are so low that they will absolutely ruin the industry. I do not think they will. I think the industry generally can get along under those rates, but I think it is a low rate for some of the manufacturers who have recently started in the dye business. It certainly is as low as we ought to go, and there can be no valid objection to the rates made in the report on coal-tar products. Now, I want to say just a word with reference to the sugar rates that will come up on the motion to recommit.

In this conference report we have increased the duties over the present duties prevailing under the present emergency tariff act by only sixteen one-hundredths of a cent, or less than one-sixth of a cent per pound, on Cuban sugar, which is the only kind we import. The rate on Cuban sugar is now 1.60 cents per pound. We have increased that rate to 1.76 cents per pound. It is true that the rate on full-duty sugars is now 2 cents and that we have increased that rate in the bill to 2.20 cents per pound, but we get no full-duty sugar, and we never will. The reciprocity treaty with Cuba, giving Cuba a rate 25 per cent below that given other countries, completely excludes them. To a married man having a family consisting of himself and wife and two children the whole additional duty of one-sixth of a cent per pound would amount to just about 20 cents a year for family use if he paid the whole of the duty. That is all the increase we have put on. Now, if any gentleman can figure out how that is going to injure anyone, he can do better than I can. I am confining myself now to the bare facts, because that is all that I can do in the time I have. I want to call your attention, however, to the fact that every time thus far that the sugar duty has been lowered the price to the consumer of sugar has been increased. The reason is that when we put our sugar factories and cane growers out of business, we put ourselves in the power of the Sugar Refining Trust and the foreign cane grower by lessening the competition against them. The consumer does not pay this duty nor any other except where there is no competition from domestic producers.

It is a fact, as shown by detailed tables presented to the Finance Committee of the Senate, that when the Cuban reciprocity treaty went into effect, lowering the duty on sugar 20 per cent, the price went up instead of falling. When we increased the duty on sugar by the emergency tariff a year ago last May the price of sugar instead of increasing, as gentlemen on the other side said it would as soon as that provision was enacted, went down and down and down for the next nine months. In the last three months it has increased somewhat. The fact is that the tariff has practically nothing to do with the price of sugar. It has something to do with the refiner's margin between raw and refined sugar, for every time we reduce the duty the oft-indicted Sugar Trust considers the reduction as a gift to it and increases its margin. When we increase the duty it decreases its margin and floods the country with propaganda against the sugar duty. The duty really falls upon the refiners and the Cubans. The Cubans say they pay all of it and are protesting against the duty. They are correct in that they pay the most of it; but we have the right to put on any duty we see fit, and we need the money.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it not a fact that the longer you have beet sugar on the market the longer the price remains low?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Always. The price of sugar goes down as soon as beet sugar comes on the market, and as long as it stays on the market the lower price prevails, and when the beet sugar is all gone, then the price of the cane sugar goes up. The beet-sugar factories have saved the consumers of sugar millions of dollars by their competition.

Mr. MADDEN. And the higher the duty the more beet sugar there will be grown in this country.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Certainly, but if we put the duty too high we would give the beet-sugar growers the advantage which we do not want to do. We only want to give them duty enough to enable them to compete with the Cubans and keep the price down. Raw sugar can be produced in Cuba for 1½ cents per pound.

Now, there is some talk about the profit of those operating beet-sugar factories. I have two beet-sugar factories in my State, both of which have lost immense sums—more than a million dollars apiece—in trying to run under prevailing tariffs. One is closed entirely. They are not in my district, and I do not mention this because these factories are located in my State, because no man can truthfully say that I have assisted in making up a single rate in this bill on the ground that the interests of my State were involved, and no man who has served with me either in the Committee on Ways and Means or in the conference committee will say that I have ever asked any rate simply on the ground that my State was interested therein. I have asked this sugar duty simply and solely on the ground that it is in the interest of the whole country and that it will in the long run reduce the price of sugar. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, how much time remains?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 26 minutes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I think it is to be regretted that there will not be more time to discuss this conference report. I think that is demonstrated by the remarks of the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. GREEN of Iowa]. He himself regrets that his side of the House saw fit to prevent at least two hours' general debate on this conference report. I understand why some gentlemen do not want to discuss this matter. I opine that their disposition would be to close up the mouths of the people throughout the country, if they could, for the next 60 or 70 days, and to close up the columns of the newspapers of the country so that they could not discuss this wicked piece of legislation. I can understand how they run politics in some States and in some cities, not allowing discussion but operating by the steam roller and boss rule. But I submit to you that in the House of Representatives you ought to have at least some debate on these problems. This is a forum where there should be full freedom of discussion.

I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] can be felicitated by the entire House upon his ability as a member of the conference committee. Every man who has served with Mr. LONGWORTH will testify to the fact that he has as much bulldog tenacity and keen intellect as a conferee or as a member of the committee as any man he ever served with, and the result of this conference shows conclusively that he dominated the conference committee, especially that he dominated it when it came to the chemical schedule.

Let this much be said about Mr. LONGWORTH as we pass. I have had lots of controversies with Mr. LONGWORTH. I never saw him turn his back to an adversary, and so far as I know and now remember I never asked him for a legislative favor in his life. He is a fair fighter. [Applause.] He and I differ. I do not know that we have ever agreed upon anything. [Laughter.] But, gentlemen, here is the trouble about it. The country is going to suffer by virtue of his ability. The country is going to suffer by virtue of his dominating that committee of conference. That is what I complain about, and that is what the country is going to complain about in the next 60 days when we come to present this matter, that his ability has placed on this country an embargo with reference to synthetic dyes, and possibly a rate so high that it will amount to an embargo on coal-tar products.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. GARNER. I would rather go on, but I will yield.

Mr. LONDON. In other words, the country needs protection against him. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. It would be well for the country——

Mr. LONGWORTH. It needs it more against Mr. LONDON. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. It might be well for the country if we could convert a few NICK LONGWORTHS on the Republican side. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] remarks that I have been on many fishing excursions during this and former Congresses, and that I have been more or less successful. I want to tell you now that in this fishing expedition to-day, while I am not going to get as many from the Republican ranks as I did on Wednesday, the sovereign voters of their States are going to get the scalps of more of them in November by virtue of this vote than by the vote that was had day before yesterday. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. In just a moment. My fishing excursion to-day is not with much hope for victory now, but for victory in November, because the people of the country are going to express their opinion of this legislation then. They will be very emphatic in the opinion which they will voice at the ballot box.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman ought to express his happiness in November and not now. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, when you gentlemen vote against this motion to recommit, dealing with the sugar duty which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] says I am going to offer, I want some Democratic opponent of each of you gentlemen to get up and tell the audience in his district that the ranking minority Democratic member on the Ways and Means Committee made a motion to recommit the tariff bill and gave you an opportunity to get sugar cheaper than you are getting it now. I want to show you Republicans that you yourselves have said by three distinct votes in this House that $2 per hundred pounds was enough duty on sugar. You voted that rate three times. Are you ging to repudiate your own action which you confirmed by three solemn votes in this House? Who is going to say that $2 is not enough on sugar when you placed yourselves on record that way three times by your votes? Why do you go up to $2.20 on sugar when you said $2 was enough? How are you going to answer that? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] puts me in mind of a certain American game. You remember he stood on the floor here last Wednesday and warned you that if you recommitted this bill it probably meant no tariff legislation prior to the election. He put me in mind of the great American game, when a man sets in his full stack and somebody calls him and it turns out, as it has turned out now, that the urbane gentleman from Ohio had only a bobtail. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNELL. What is the game?

Mr. GARNER. The illustration to-day shows conclusively that the gentleman from Ohio is familiar with the game and that he played you Republicans for suckers, but you called his bluff and he did not have anything in his hand. [Laughter.] The conferees are back here with the bill to-day. If the House will recommit this bill and put sugar at $2, as is the rate in the emergency tariff to-day and as it was carried in the bill when it passed the House, we will have this tariff bill on the statute books within a week with the rate at $2 instead of $2.20.

Mr. MCARTHUR. It will be on the statute books anyway.

Mr. GARNER. That may be.

I want to call your attention to the fact that this identical question has been voted on in another body. Who supported it in the other body? Has the rate which I am going to propose any authority from the Republican standpoint? You Republicans are talking among yourselves about your reluctance to vote against the organization. Let us see whether this motion I am going to make has any support among the Republican leaders in this Nation. Who represents the Republican Party in another body? Who is the leader of the other body? Examine the RECORD and you will find that he voted in another body for the rates which will be contained in the motion that I am going to make. Who represents the great imperial State of New York in another body? You will find on examining the RECORD that the representative from that imperial State voted for the motion that I am going to make. Do you want to cross with your Senators? Do you want to have to defend one vote and your Senators another? I merely call that to the attention of you Republicans for your own welfare.

Mr. LONGWORTH rose.

Mr. GARNER. Just a moment. I was told this morning by a very good Democratic friend, and I think probably there was something in what he said, that so far as the action day before yesterday was concerned it saved the seats of several individual Members in the House on the Republican side. But to-day, as I said in the beginning, I know you are going to vote down this motion, but when you do it I am hoping that this sugar teat will come to you in November when it will have a bitter end to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is it a part of the gentleman's argument that the price of sugar was lower under the Underwood tariff?

Mr. GARNER. Oh, I have never talked anything about the price of sugar. [Laughter.] If the gentleman from Ohio wishes to argue that the higher you put the duty the lower the price of sugar will be, if he can convince the American people of that, then I will know that they are all crazy, and there would be no use in trying to appeal to them at all. But, of course, the American people are not crazy, and the gentleman from Ohio, with all of his persuasive eloquence, can never make them believe that the higher you put the rate the cheaper the sugar. But I was about to call the attention of you gentlemen here who are going to stay with the organization to-day, because you feel you can not afford to tear away from the reservation too often, that when you go to New Jersey in the coming campaign and a Member of another body who will ask for the support of the electors of that great State has voted for a $2 duty on sugar, voted to accept the House rate, what are you New Jersey Members going to say who are now taking the position that the duty on sugar ought to be $2.20 instead of $2?

And when you go to Maine—you have had an election in Maine [applause on the Republican side], 36,000 reduction from your former plurality. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You might as well talk about Mississippi or Texas going Republican as to talk about Maine going Democratic. But when your vote is reduced 36,000 below your former plurality there must be something wrong. I do not know whether it is in Maine or Washington. I expect it is both.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The trouble is with the gentleman's figures.

Mr. GARNER. Now, go to Wisconsin. The Republican Party has a leadership there, or at least they claim they have. There is leadership from Massachusetts in the Senate and supposed to be leadership in Wisconsin. Wisconsin said we ought to have $2 sugar, and threatened to vote against the bill if it was not cut down in conference. You did cut it down a little in conference, but not enough. You have got to go back to West Virginia for election, and you are going out to fight your Senator because he voted for the lower rate on sugar.

Gentlemen, I do not know what the American people will do. If the American people can understand this bill, if the American people can understand what its passage is costing them between now and the November election, I have not the slightest doubt but what they will repudiate the party that put such a vicious measure on the statute book. [Applause on the Democratic side].

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Why is the gentleman so solicitous for the success of the Republican Party?

Mr. GARNER. I stated a while ago that I did not expect to accomplish much to-day except to beat a few Republicans in November by this motion to recommit. After they who voted with us last Wednesday have been lashed as they have for the last 48 hours, it is hard to expect them to get up and take the bit in their mouth and run up against the collar once more.

But, gentlemen, you are going on record whether you want $2 sugar or $2.20 sugar.

I want to put it up square what you are going to vote for. After I have done that, it is up to you whether you do it or not. As I said to the gentleman from Illinois, I do not expect that the motion to recommit will carry, but I expect that many of you Republicans in voting against it will know in your conscience you do not believe in $2.20 sugar. You know you do not believe in it, but you vote for it because you want to be regular, and you are afraid to go home and be charged with not being Republican but as having voted with the Democrats. The country will not accept that kind of an excuse. The record will bind you to $2.20 sugar, and in 1924 when the burden of $2.20 sugar will be felt in this country I hope it will end with a righteous vote of the people and a complete return of Democrats to power. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, my good friend from Texas day before yesterday started out to lead a crowd. To-day he will end that race about as the horse did that an Irishman bet on at the races. The Irishman asked for a tip, and somebody said, "Bet your money on Dandy." When the horses started off Dandy got a splendid lead, but when they came down the stretch the Irishman waved his hat and said, "Look at Dandy! Look at Dandy! Driving everything before him." [Laughter.]

Gentlemen on this side of the House, when you find Democrats opposing a tariff measure make up your minds that it is all right. [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman from Texas helped to prepare the Underwood tariff bill that put one cent and a quarter on full-duty-paying sugar and 1 cent on Cuban sugar. Why is he now so solicitous for 2 cents on full-duty-paying sugar? Has he discovered the error of a few years ago?

Let me say to you that we produce in the United States from cane sugar 28 per cent of the consumption of four and one-quarter million tons. About 25 per cent of the consumption is imported from our insular possessions. The remainder, or nearly one-half of the consumption, is imported from duty-paying countries, 98 or 99 per cent coming from Cuba. In this bill the duty is not $2.20 a hundred on Cuban sugar but $1.76 a hundred. [Applause.]

It has been demonstrated by charts which we had before the committee that every time the duty has been increased by Congress the sugar exporter took that increase to himself and the consumer did not get a penny. Every time we have reduced the duty on sugar the sugar-refining companies have taken the benefit to themselves and the consumer got not a single cent. That is the record for years gone by, and, as the gentleman from Iowa has said, every time the domestic crop comes on the market down goes the price to the consumer, and the very minute that the domestic crop is off up goes the price of sugar by the refining companies.

Oh, when the Cubans offered their crop to us just after the war for 7 cents a pound if this Government would agree to take their entire output, and the President declined to enter into that contract, we, the people of the United States, within six months from that date paid $588,000,000 more than 7 cents a pound. President Woodrow Wilson, though appealed to, refused to make that contract, and the people of this country were fleeced in the first six months after the cancellation of the old contract out of nearly $600,000,000. That is what was done in the United States, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] knows now that within six months after the adoption of the Underwood bill 42 per cent of the factories in Louisiana closed their doors and went out of business and have not yet returned to the production of sugar. You know that you did that! [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARNER moves that the bill (H. R. 7456) be recommitted to the committee of conference with instructions to the House conferees to recede from their disagreement with Senate amendment No. 667, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

"In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert 'seventy-one one-hundredths'; and on page 81, line 8, of the House bill strike out 'cents' and insert 'of one cent'; and with the further instruction to the House conferees to recede from their disagreement with Senate amendment No. 668, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

"In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert 'twenty-six one-thousandths.'"

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves the previous question, and the gentleman from Colorado rises to a point of order. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Colorado on his point of order.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the motion to recommit on the ground that it seeks to instruct the conferees to agree to a rate of duty on sugar which is lower than the rate provided in the bill as it passed the House, and also lower than the rate that was established by the Senate. In other words, it fixes a rate that could not be in conference, and the conferees would have no jurisdiction to agree to such a rate, and this House has no parliamentary authority to instruct the conferees to agree upon such a rate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I make another motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers another motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARNER moves that the bill (H. R. 7456) be recommitted to the committee on conference with instructions to the House conferees to further insist upon their disagreement with Senate amendments numbered 667 and 668, and that said conferees be instructed to insist upon the following:

"PAR. 501. Sugars, tank bottoms, sirups of cane juice, melada, concentrated melada, concrete and concentrated molasses, testing by the polariscope not above 75 sugar degrees, and all mixtures containing sugar and water, testing by the polariscope above 50 sugar degrees and not above 75 sugar degrees, 1.16 cents per pound, and for each additional sugar degree shown by the polariscope test, four one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound additional, and fractions of a degree in proportion."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the motion to recommit, that the motion to recommit is beyond the power of the House.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, the fourth subdivision of Rule XVI of the House provides as follows:

After the previous question shall have been ordered on the passage of a bill or joint resolution one motion to recommit shall be in order.

In this case on this bill, when the bill was before the House for consideration on final passage, the previous question on the bill to final passage was ordered. At that time a motion to recommit was submitted and voted down. Now we have again, on yesterday, a motion to again recommit to the conference committee. That was a second motion to recommit. The proposition now before us is again to recommit to the conference committee, which is a third motion to recommit.

The proposition involved now is merely this: The previous question has been ordered. The rule provides that when the previous question has been ordered one motion only to recommit shall be in order. There is no provision anywhere in any rule that makes an exception to that requirement. There is no provision anywhere that says that on the motion to recommit you may have just as many motions as you desire after the previous question has been ordered. The previous question has not only been ordered on the bill, but it has been ordered on these motions to recommit.

Perhaps it will be suggested that this is not on the final passage of the bill, as the language would indicate. Let us see whether or not that is true. The rules provide—and the practice is well settled—that the bill is passed when the motion to adopt the conference report is adopted, so that we are now really determining the question as to whether or not the bill shall be passed, because if we sustain the report of the conference committee without sending it again to conference the bill is passed. There has already been made a motion to recommit the bill, so that now to entertain, to entertain ad libitum, to consecutively entertain successive motions to recommit this conference report on the bill when the object and purpose of our rules is to bring the bill to final passage as soon as possible, is, as it seems to me, a contradiction of a direct rule of the House.

I am aware of the fact that there are some decisions in previous rulings made by occupants of the chair that might seem to indicate that perhaps it might be interpreted as meaning that more than one motion to recommit could be made in cases like the present one.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we should not, under any circumstances, strain a point to make exceptions to the rule. It seems to me it should be the duty of the Speaker to restrain it within at least reasonable limits, and I submit that to allow successive motions to recommit on the final passage of a bill after the previous question has been ordered is contrary to the intention and purpose of the rule which says clearly and plainly that there shall be only one motion to recommit upon a bill when it is being submitted to the House for final determination.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to urge as a second reason why this motion should not be entertained at this time, that it is a well-settled rule of the House that when it has taken action upon a definite proposition such as is involved in this motion to recommit, there shall not be entertained a motion to recommit to reconsider and review the action that the House has already taken.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That which is involved in the motion to recommit is exactly what the House has adopted. The House has never at any time in any way adopted anything else. How then can the gentleman say that it has been acted upon otherwise?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not quite understand the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That which is in the motion to recommit is what the House adopted when the House acted upon it before.

Mr. TOWNER. That may be true, but does the gentleman think that the rule was made to apply only in one way? Can we successively have put before the House the same question, whether it is again determined in the same way or not? Certainly not. If that should be true, then the House could successively take up every proposition upon which there has been any change in a conference report. That does not change the proposition whether it is in the same form, in the same language, with the identical proposition that was voted on before in the House. The proposition is, Mr. Speaker, that if the House has acted upon that proposition it shall not be again called upon to act upon the same proposition. We may change the action of the Committee of the Whole House, but we can not by a motion to recommit change the action of the House when the House itself has acted upon the proposition.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But if we do not recommit we are changing the action of the House.

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, that is only so in words. The proposition involved is a clear one, that we should not be called upon in a motion to recommit to pass upon a proposition which the House has already passed upon, when such proposition has been distinctly before the House. At least, Mr. Speaker, I feel it my duty to call the attention of the Speaker to this proposition: It might be that with the 10,000 items contained in this bill these items could be called up successively. That would do away with the rules of the House, which are expressly formed to prevent such procedure. It would prevent the expeditious dispatch of business. There never has been a tariff bill passed under such circumstances as that, and certainly the rule ought not to be extended by the Speaker when such results may follow if there is any possible way to avoid it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. If this were a novel question the Chair would be disposed to give more consideration to the points raised by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], but the right to a motion to recommit after the previous question has been ordered is of many years' standing. This very question, whether when the House had recommitted a bill and it came back another motion to recommit could be offered, arose under Speaker Carlisle, who, in answer to the claim that there having been one motion to recommit which succeeded there could not be another, said:

> This is not the same proposition at all. At the time the House recommitted the bill to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to report it back after striking out a certain clause, there was in the bill a provision to pay certain employees of the Government a month's extra compensation. The bill being then on its passage, it was recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations under these instructions. It now comes back under a rule of the House, and is on its third reading and open for further amendment. The bill does not now contain that clause. It is an entirely different report from the Committee on Appropriations from that upon which the House was acting an hour or so ago. * * * Under the rule there can be but one motion to recommit the bill when the question is on its passage, and no other motion can be made. But this is a different bill, a different report from the committee, and the motion is in order.

It seems to the Chair the principle then enunciated covers this case. This is a different report from the one on which the motion to recommit was made yesterday, for the conferees have changed it. If the Chair should rule in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], it would never be possible to have the motion to recommit on any conference report if when the bill was on its passage there had been one motion to recommit, because under that logic, there having been one motion to recommit, there could never be another. The House is well aware of the constant practice to the contrary. The case which the Chair referred to once before to-day, of the Army bill at the beginning of the war, is in point. If the Chair remembers correctly it went back to the conference committee several times under new motions to recommit. The Chair is constrained by the continuous practice of the House and by the precedents to overrule the point of order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the motion to recommit, to include wool.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to move the previous question.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will it be possible to offer an amendment to the motion to recommit so as to include wool along with the sugar schedule?

The SPEAKER. It will if the House votes down the motion for the previous question. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] to recommit with instructions.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, let us have the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 110, nays 191, answered "present" 2, not voting 124, as follows:
